

At Tabor's hill, Scarborough, Ont., carved Indian figures recall the story of an early Indian community there. And, if present plans materialize, the site will soon become a national park. Two years ago construction crews uncovered evidence of an Indian burial ground there and dozens of skeletons, being examined by Jack Chester left, of the Scarborough health department, were dug up. Ontario Indians then held a convention and reburied the bones of their ancestors and were promised the land would not be disturbed again.
