Attitude To Blind People Has Been Changed By C.N.I.B.

"Almost every blind person" I've met seems to be wearing a smile. "How come?" I was asked the other day, "observed Mr. S.T. Green, chairman of Prince Edward Island Advisory Board to The Canadian National Institute for the Blind. "My first impulse was to reply that blind people smile perpetually because they are not visually influenced by the looks of stress and tension on the faces of men and women around them. But I reconsidered this snap judgement and put some serious thought into the matter. Happy people are people with many friends. The blind have many friends, some of whom they know personally but many more they know only as a guiding hand or as the cherry voice of a youngster chirping a "good morning".

"This friendly attitude towards the sightless has not always existed," continued Mr. Green, "I believe it is due largely to the informative and constructive programme carried on by The Canadian National Institute for the Blind since as early as 1918. I've been a member of the P.E.I. Advisory Board for eight years and regard its work with a critical but proud eye. Blind men and women are working at full time jobs because they have been properly trained by C.N.I.B. employment officers. DAILY DUTIES Sightless housewives are carrying out their daily duties because a blind home teacher is providing the necessary instruction and encouragement. Infants blinded early in life are receiving specialized and constructive attention from professional counsellors. Annual fund appeals by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind such as that currently underway, make all these things possible. Yes," reflected Mr. Green, "the blind wear a smile, why shouldn't they? They have so many friends."
