Toll Of School Bell Marks Summer Vacation's End

This was the morning that James set down the final nail and came to join in the year. Together we watched Granddaughter James as far as the pig-kind are out of doors. The sows, come out of their lairs, and return to that arduous yet wibald rewarding Alpine climb, which is the student's lot.

"Oh like the quarry slave I go" she smiled at parting, her happy expression beyond the words of her quote. And she stepped away eagerly, down the lane and out into the new of the day, eyes ahead to this or that near or far goal of youth.

James at the choring set down his pails at the piggy-bank. Now, of course, the pig-kind are out of doors. The sows, come out of their lairs, and return to that arduous yet wibald rewarding Alpine climb, which is the student's lot.

"Oh like the quarry slave I go" she smiled at parting, her happy expression beyond the words of her quote. And she stepped away eagerly, down the lane and out into the new of the day, eyes ahead to this or that near or far goal of youth.

"She may as well have stayed at home with us. She would give us a ride in the car, and we'd only to drive a tractor in the field if she commended."

"This education is no more or less of a waste, in more ways than one," continued. "They study — and it must be hard dreary work — and they gain their certificates or diplomas or whatever they work for, and then what do they do? Get married! And their schooling is wasted. They don't need more of an education to keep house."

"They do," we said. "They need all the knowledge in the world — yes, all their mothers taught them, all they have acquired themselves, and besides all the skills, and accomplishments they have picked up themselves, all they then they often find themselves bewildered."

"Just keeping house and helping rear a family!" James exclaimed.

"They do claim that when you educate a boy, you educate only one person, but when you educate a girl, you educate a whole family."

"I know," James knelt, he needed. "All the same, she looked off over the farm. "See how that grain is turning. It will soon be ready for the binder," he nodded.

"We smiled. If James' heart was in the fields, somewhere in it was a warmer care for the children of the name. He missed them when they were away from the farms. But as far as he is concerned, Granddaughter or any of the children who do a class, may attend all the classes of learning they wish, if they do not possess that labor yearning which serves to keep them "down on the farm."

"Did you ever see a past sunset, a green sky?" Mack queried this evening.

"Green like a mallowing harp — with touches of gold in it?" It was like this evening's sunset. The sun had set. Silver-blue it is now above the mill. And it is there the Lady comes in to walk, he's silvery shaw.

"Until tomorrow — a Diary — Good."
