THINGS MR. ATKINS DOES FOR HIMSELF.

A spell of active service is the only incentive which the average British soldier requires in order to develop a wealth of inventive power and a faculty of making himself comfortable, of which few people in times of peace have suspected him. While in barracks he is surrounded, as it were, by all the comforts of a home, but the moment he sets foot in South Africa he must say farewell to most of the good things to which he has been accustomed. For nearly three weeks we have been settled in Bloemfontein, but the vast majority of the men, who have their temporary homes on the undulating veldt which surrounds the city, are still without canvas tents. The sun beats down upon this country during March with a power which you in England experience only in July or August, albeit the hours before sunrise are sometimes bitterly cold. To provide shade by day and warmth by night, parties of four soldiers combine their slender resources. A couple of brown blankets are neatly tied together, and then stretched across a piece of rope, which is kept in position by two upright pieces of stick or props. This leaves an open triangular space at each end, which is filled in by a piece of sacking, a sheep or bullock's skin, and your house is complete. During the day the four soldiers can eat their meals without fear of sunstroke, and at night, by keeping close together, wearing all their clothes and covering themselves with the two blankets which remain, they may escape being numbed with cold.

During the warmer nights many soldiers have preferred to sleep beneath the stars without the protection of a blanket tent. I have tried the plan myself, and cordially recommend its adoption to such tourists and sportsmen as may decide to visit this state before hotel and boarding houses shall have been erected for their accommodation. The best way is to follow the example of Tommy Atkins, who generally excavates a little hollow in the ground in which the right or left shoulder may rest, and a second cavity for the hip. When these depressions in Mother Earth have been made satisfactorily a waterproof sheet is placed over them, and the bed is complete. A bed, excavated in the fashion I have described, has serious disadvantages in a nocturnal rainstorm. When the ground is flat, the water has a chance of getting away, but in the case of hollows for shoulder and hip joints two little ponds of water soon appear.

THE MORNING TUB.

No morning tub is provided for the soldier, but he sometimes meets the difficulties by placing his waterproof sheet over a hole in the ground, filling up with water, and standing therein. In many cases he is able to bathe in a neighboring pond or river, while at other times I have seen him perform his morning ablutions by the aid of a cup of water only. The latter is obtained easily enough, but the work of rinsing involves much anxious thought and care. In order that the soap may be cleared away satisfactorily the aid of a comrade is generally invoked, to whom the task of sprinkling the remainder of the water on the neck, both judiciously and gingerly, should be intrusted.

Life on the veldt naturally develops all the resources of a cook, and I make bold to say that the British soldier has in this respect shown great adaptability. The bully beef and hard biscuit served out to the British army require much careful treatment before they become palatable, and Mr. Atkins has been devoting himself to the task of improving both articles. Among the articles of his equipment is a mess tin, which serves alternately as saucapau, frying pan and teapot. The bully beef is made quite tasty for a hungry soldier when stewed with a few vegetables, which can be found even in this somewhat desolate country, and the biscuits, when boiled with milk and sugar, take the place of pudding. So far the field service ovens have not made their appearance, but there are plenty of big ant-hills which can be scooped hollow, and answer just as well. I have eaten bread made of two parts of flour and one of bran, cooked over an ant-hill, which prefer to the regimental biscuit, on the grounds both of taste and digestive qualities. The army rations, I am informed, are admirably adapted to "sustaining life," but I have not met a soldier who will not tell you that they are trying to the soundest of teeth and the hardest of gums.

MANY CAMPAIGN WRINKLES.

The ant hills, as ovens for cooking bread, are not less useful to our army in times of peace than in times of battle, when they make good bullet screens. So valued are they, indeed, that a couple of our scouts, who were being fired at by the Boers, actually got up and fought each other for the possession of one, to which both laid claim. After a well-contested round, the smaller man was knocked out, whereupon his comrade, with much chivalry, pulled his fallen foe toward the protection of the mound, which henceforth sheltered the two. Mr Atkins distains filters, and I have frequently seen him drinking from pools which would be condemned in England by any sanitary inspector. His peculiar method consists simply in this, that he clenches his teeth tightly, and then, by sucking slowly, he avoids taking any water-leeches and other unpleasant things into his mouth.

All these campaign wrinkles are practised by infantry and cavalry alike, but the possession of a horse enables the mounted man to equip himself a little more efficiently than his comrades on foot. Thus, I have seen men belonging to Rimington's Scouts carrying on their saddles a canvas bag, holding enough water for a couple of days. They made the receptacle themselves by sewing the material very closely together, leaving a small aperture at one corner for the insertion of a piece of hollow cane or cork. For a day or two the bag serves, but subsequently it becomes quite waterproof, and being carried in the open air the contents remain cool. A mounted infantryman is never at a loss for a bridle, providing he has enough string, and only this morning I saw a member of the Lord Mayor's Own riding out to camp with a saddle and stirrups improvised for the occasion out of an old blanket, piece of rope, and stiff wire.

In the department of mending and tailoring Mr. Atkins has been competing successfully with the boys of the Naval Brigade. Last year, at the close of the naval manoeuvres, the bluejackets of Her Majesty's ship, Sanspareil, made a serge dress and a pretty toque for the wife of a skipper whose vessel they had run down in the night. Tommy would have been unequal to dress or toque, but in the art of patching and button-holing he is not easily beaten. Of late he has had more practice than he desired, for the smart suits of khaki and puttee leggings in which he left England are now terribly worn and travel-stained. He is able to make one shirt, and one pair of socks last for a month, or even a longer period, but the uniform in which he now stands will hardly hold together until we reach Pretoria. It was only yesterday that I saw a company belonging to one of the Irish regiments, every man of which was in so deplorable a plight as regards clothes that, on the score of decency, he would not have been allowed to show himself in the streets at home. Tunics and trousers were both in shreds. It will obviously be impossible to leave Bloemfontein before fresh garments have arrived, and in view of the approaching winter here they must be of warm material. Meantime, our soldiers disport themselves in this capital with the certain consciousness that they are unable to appeal to the ladies of the town, as in the days when they wore tunics of dazzling red and buttons of polished brass. Valor on the field is admirable, but a smart suit of clothes in the Orange River Colony is not less effective than in England as a passport to the nursemaid's heart, even though she be as dark as ebony and her locks be frizzled. Patches, grease, and travel-stains are powerless to attract the attention of the fair, and for that reason alone resourceful Mr. Atkins sighs occasionally for the brave trappings which he has temporarily exchanged for a suit of khaki, in a land where almost everything is of the same tint as the clothes which he wears.—London Tel.
