GRACE WELDON,

—OR—

FREDERICA, THE BONNET-GIRL.

CHAPTER XX.—Continued.

THE SUSPICION.

'It is not an ignorant man, like this fellow, you have for an enemy here, James. Your foe is an educated and accomplished person, or he could not have written either the note or the draft, as you observe; but more than this, he is a man of business; he is acquainted with banking affairs; he knows my own banking concerns, and is familiar, wonderfully so, with all our banking operations. It is evident that the principal is neither the negro, the lad, nor the female. They are, as she confesses, but tools. The true man remains behind the curtain, and puts them forward. You, she said, was this person; but I am satisfied it is another, and she who wrote this false letter is as bad as he!'

'This letter, I am satisfied, sir,' said James, after having for a few moments been carefully reading it over; 'this letter, I am more and more convinced, was not written by a female!'

'That idea never struck me. What leads you to suspect this? It seems to me quite likely that it may be as you say!'

'The business terms she uses, no female would employ. The letter could have been written only by a person aequainted with business, far beyond what a woman would be supposed to know. Her language about "checking," "over-checking," "depositing," and the general mercantile air of the whole, leads me to suspect that the person who forged the check and also my handwriting, forged this female signature!'

'You are right, you must be right in your conjectures, James. This note was written hy a man, and one familiar with the mode of doing business among merchants. In a word, I think it was written by a merchant!'

'By a merchant?' repeated James, with surprise.

'Yes. There are merchants who are destitute of principle as well as other men. Who have you offended?'

'No one, sir.'

'Nor merchant's clerk?'

'No—nay—I had forgotten—but it is impossible to think of him!'

'We have got to think of somebody, and when we discover the somebody, we shall no doubt be both confounded. We must, therefore, not think it an impossible thing to think of any person on whom our thoughts happen to light. Who is on your mind, James? It is necessary we should probe this matter to the quick. Nothing must be kept behind; for the least thing may serve to throw light upon the path.'

'I was thinking of Carlton Ellery, sir; but I hesitated to speak out my thoughts, lest, for one reason, it might seem to appear that I suspected him because I had been his rival.'

'Have you reason to think young Ellery is your enemy?'

'His looks are not very friendly when we meet and pass in the street; but he has never spoken to me in any hostile manner.'

'Yet you believe him your enemy?'

'To tell you the truth, sir, I have had an instinctive suspicion that he would do me an evil turn if it was in his power. This has been my feeling. It is only a feeling; for as I have said, we have never quarrelled.'

Mr. Weldon remained a few moments in an attitude of profound thought. James sat with his eyes fixed upon the face of his benefactor with solicitous anticipation of the result of his reflections. His face was calm, but pale; his manner dignified, yet depressed. He felt severely, as became a sensitive and honorable mind, the painful position in which he had been so suddenly and mysteriously placed; and although he was convinced, that in the mind of Mr. Weldon there remained not the least suspicion against himself, yet he desired most earnestly to be able to convince him, by proof, of his innocence. He could not rest satisfied with the generous acquittal of his benefactor's heart and head, but he wisbed to prove clearly to him that he had not acquitted without grounds. The fear lest his enemies should keep themselves so concealed that he should be unable to afford this proof, caused him the deepest anguish of spirit. But trusting in his innocence, and the overruling justice of Providence, he tried to hope against despair.

'What do you know, James, of Ellery's character? Has he not the reputation of being wild?'

'As all will depend on an open scrutiny of the characters that are suggested to us, I will not hesitate to say freely what I know of him. He has the reputation of being dissipated. He attends the theatres frequently. He gives suppers and plays heavily, I am told. But this I have only heard of him recently. He is a young man whose morals are not the most pure!'

'That is my vague suspicion of the young man. Do you know anything against his principles? Have you ever heard any act spoken of, of his, unworthy a gentleman?'

'No, sir; I have only heard his general habits commented upon in the counting-room, by Mr. Finney as freely as any one; and he knows him, I believe, somewhat intimately.'

Mr. Weldon rose from his chair, placed his hands crossed behind him, and with his head drooped upon his breast, slowly walked the room. James saw that he was deeply revolving the perplexing matter in his mind. He also gave up his thoughts to the train of ideas which Ellery's name had suggested, and suspicions of him forced themselves slowly but most impressively upon him. Suddenly Mr. Weldon stood still before him.

'James,' he said, in a low but firm tone, 'I suspect this young man! You have no other enemies capable by education and circumstances of perpetrating this enormous and singularly skilful fraud but him. He is in a mercantile house, too, and hence the knowledge of mercantile affairs manifested in the note as well as in the transaction throughout. He is often in the habit of coming here! He has, therefore, opportunities of getting specimens of your writing, and of getting a knowledge of our banking affairs. You say that Mr. Finney is intimate with him. Through Mr. Finney, by subtle questioning, he may have learned much, for I do not suspect Mr. Finney at all!'

'Nor do I, sir,' answered James, warmly. 'But every word you say strengthens my belief that the enemy who seeks my ruin is Mr. Ellery!'

'There is no question of it. It is some one who has had access to our blank check file, and has examined the checks I have drawn, perhaps purloined the blanks here, and taken away one of the paid checks from the bank; for I have seen him once or twice in the Director's room with his uncle, Colonel Duane, who is a Director, and whose fortune he will inherit, that is, if he be innocent here! He may have obtained one of my dead checks within the bank, to serve him as a copy. If it be Ellery, he has been placed under favorable circumstances for accomplishing his nefarious ends; and has shown no little industry, skill, and perseverance.'

'We had one hundred blank checks placed on the wire for use; there are five missing from the file over the number that has been filled out! These my enemy, whoever he be, has probably taken away!'

'Mr. Finney!' called the merchant, in an elevated tone.

'Sir,' answered the book-keeper, opening the door, and partly thrusting in his head, ornamented with a pen stuck over the right ear.

'Come in and shut the door, if you please.'

Mr. Finney did as he was directed to do, and stared at the grave faces of the two gentlemen.

'Mr. Finney, do persons who visit the counting-room during my absence or that of Mr. Daily, ever enter here?'

'Oh, no, sir! No one ever comes here unless you are in! I tell every body that is your sanctum, and no one goes in without very special business! Oh, no, sir!'

'None of your friends?'

'Not one, sir.'

'I didn't know but that perhaps, Mr. Ellery or—'

'Never, sir! Ellery is the last man I would let in here, he is so prying and curious!'

'He is?'

'Yes, sir. He puts twenty questions in five minutes, and seems half the time to have nothing to do but to talk chit-chat in counting-rooms! But that's owin' to his bein' an heir, and it makes him quite indifferent about business!'

'Then he has not been in here?'

'Of that I am most positive, sir! for I remember two or three weeks ago he was in, and was passing into the sanctum in a lounging way, but I shut the door, and he turned away.'

'Did he make any remark?'

'He laughed, sir, and said he wasn't going to steal your bank-book, sir. An odd idea, very solemnly observed the methodical and starched Finney. He laughed and said then he would peep in, and so, as the cross sash was down, he leaned over and looked in here, admiring the neat appearance of every thing, for he said it was the handsomest private counting-room in the city!

'In that way he could have reached in and abstracted the blank checks from the file,' said James, in an under tone.

'Yes. I am satisfied I now know the man! Mr. Finney you may retire.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE RUSE.

That Carlton Ellery was the secret enemy who had devised and executed the scheme to ruin James, which had so nearly proved successful, neither Mr. Weldon nor himself had now any doubt. They, therefore, resolved to take such steps as should fasten upon him the guilt.

'It is necessary to proceed with the greatest caution,' said Mr. Weldon, after Finney had closed the door between the two counting-rooms. 'From the skill with which this wicked affair has been managed by Ellery, it will prove a difficult task to bring home the crime upon him. To succeed, we must be as skilful, cautious, and secret as he has been.'

'I see the difficulties in the way, as we have no positive evidence,' answered James. 'I am at a loss how to proceed, unless I wait upon him, and openly charge him with the crime.'

'This would bring only denial, and perhaps make it impossible for you to convict him afterwards. We must act with subtlety. Perhaps,' continued Mr. Weldon, looking fixedly at James, and speaking with slight hesitation, 'perhaps it would be policy for me to act as if I believed you to be guilty! Nay, do not start so, with surprise and doubt on your countenance. My proposition is, that you, for a day or two, remain away from the counting-room, as if I had discharged you. This will draw Ellery's notice, for he will be now on the watch for the fruits of my knowledge of the forgeries. It is not improbable that he may place himself in the way as we go to dinner, to watch our faces, to see if he can judge of what has passed by them. If we should be seen walking together, and conversing as heretofore, he would at once see that you had succeeded in clearing yourself; and this would either lead him to try some other means to ruin you, or else, fearing suspicion might fall upon the true man, remove himself beyond the reach of the punishment due to his crimes. You see I speak very positively as to his guilt, of which, the more I reflect upon his character and conduct, I have not the least doubt. What think you, James, of bearing the imputation of my displeasure for a few days, until something can be discovered?'

'I approve of your suggestion, sir. It will no doubt lead Ellery, or whoever may be my enemy, to believe that I have been privately dismissed by you, you declining to prosecute.'

'This is what I wish him to believe.'

'But, sir, may he not bruit abroad the fact, and may it not be generally believed, that I forged, and have been degraded by you?'

'No, he will not dare speak of it, for he will only betray thereby a knowledge of the facts, which would at once condemn him as guilty. If I should hear that Ellery had told any one that you had been dismissed from my employ because you had forged drafts on the bank, I would not hesitate to have him arrested on the spot, James, as the forger himself! The facts, you know, James, are only known to ourselves, to Mr. Morley, the cashier, and to the real culprit. Now, if it is rumored by any one that you have forged, it must be by this unknown fourth party, who, without question, is Ellery.'

'I see, sir. But Mr. Morley—may he not——'

'Mr. Morley will, for his own credit's sake, keep silent. In paying drafts so largely overdrawn, he has done what the board would not justify; and, if known, would subject him to censure, if not to dismissal.'

'I am ready to acquiesce, in your suggestion, sir,' answered James, after a moment's grave reflection. 'It seems a judicious, and perhaps the only course. But if Ellery intends to accomplish my ruin, he will not keep silent when he finds I have left you. He will, by some means, give publicity to my apparent guilt, and then, in the estimation of the world, I am really guilty! My reputation will then be indeed gone!'

'I repeat, James, that he will not dare speak of it! I do not think he cares to destroy you, only so far as you may be prevented from being longer his rival in Grace's affections. I speak plainly, you see. His object is to ruin you in my estimation alone. He only wishes to defeat your object in the attainment of the hand of my daughter. Beyond this, I do not think he has aimed. This accomplished, his purposes will be satisfied. Therefore, when he sees that you have left me, and that all intercourse has ceased between us, he will feel that his aim is achieved; that he need fear you no longer as a rival!'

'That is my opinion, sir,' answered James; but I felt a delicacy in parking my mind so plainly as you have done. At all events, sir, if I am calumniated, you, at least, will believe me innocent,' he said, with emotion.

'Yes; and the world shall too! If a breath is blown abroad against you, I will have Ellery arrested; for on his conviction will then hang your innocence! I have business now in State street, and will leave you. You can depart soon after. If you learn anything, call and let me know at my house, after sunset, so that you may enter unobserved; or else write me a note. If I hear anything, I will let you know. Now, good morning, my friend, and bear up manfully; for the assurance that the person in whose eyes you were to be ruined believes you innocent, should, with the consciousness of innocence, render you cheerful, and give you that energy and hope which will be necessary.'

ALL CURES MADE EASY!

BY

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Bad Legs, Ulcerous Sores, Bad Breasts, and Old Wounds.

No description of wound, sore or ulcer can resist the healing properties of this excellent Ointment. The worst cases readily assume a healthy appearance whenever this medical antis applied; sound flesh springs up from the bottom of the wound, inflammation of the surrounding skin is arrested and a complete and permanent cure quickly follow the use of the ointment.

Piles, Fistulas, and Internal Inflammation

These disressing and weakening diseases may with certainty be cured by the sufferers themselves, if they will use Holloway's Ointment, and closely attend to the printed instructions. It should be well rubbed upon the neighboring parts, when all obnoxious matter will be removed. A poultice of bread and water may sometimes be applied at bed time with advantage; the most scrupulous cleanliness must be observed. If those who read this paragraph will bring it under the notice of such of their acquaintances whom it may concern, they will render a service thatwill never be forgotten, as a cure is certain.

Rheumatism, Gout and Neuralgia.

Nothing has the power of reducing inflammation and subduing pain in these complaints in the same degree as Holloway's cooling Ointment and purifying Pills. When used simultaneously they drive all inflammation and depravities from the system, subdue and remove all enlargement of the joints, and leave the sinews and muscles lax and uncontracted. A cure may always beeffected, even under the worst circumstance, if the use of these medicines be persevered in.

Eruptions, Scald Head, Ringworm, and other Skin Diseases.

After fomentation with warm water, the utmost relief and speediest cure can be readily obtained in all complaints affecting the skin and joints, by the simultaneous use of the Ointment and Pills. But it must be remembered that nearly all skin diseases indicate the depravity of the blood and derangement of the liver and stomach, consequently, in many cases, time is required to purify the blood, which will be effected by a judicious use of the Pills. The general health will readily be improved, although the eruption may be driven out more freely than before, and which should be promoted; perseverance is necessary.

Sore Throats, Diptheria, Quinsey, Mumps, and all other Derangements of the Throat.

On the appearance of any of these maladies the Ointment should be well rubbed at least three times a day upon the neck and upper part of the chest, so as to penetrate to the glands, as salt is forced into meat; this course will at once remove inflammation and ulceration. The worst cases will yield to this treatment by following the printed directions.

Scrofula or King's Evil and Swelling of the Glands.

This class of cases may be cured by Holloway's purifying Pills and Ointment, as their double action of purifying the blood and strengthening the system renders them more affable than any other remedy for all complaints of a scrofulo nature. As the blood is impure, liver, stomach and bowels being much deranged, require purifying medicin to bring about a cure.

Both the Ointment nd Pills should be used in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Chilblains	Fistulas	Skin-diseases
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Gout	Sore-nippes
Burns	Chapped Hands	Glandular	Sore-throaits
Bunions	Corns (Softs)	swellings	Scurvy
Bites of Moschetoes and	Cancers	Lumbago	Sore-heads
Sand-flies	Contracted and Stiff Joints	Piles	Tumors
Coco-bay	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Ulcers
		Scalds Yaws	Wounds
