Fascist Violence Cases Concern In Great Britain

By TOM OCHILTREE

LONDON (AP) — A rotten tomato splashes against the side of a young policeman's face, knocking off his helmet.

Fights break out around a platform where chest-thumping Fascist speakers are marooned in a pulsing swarm of angry humanity.

Somewhere in the crowd a pretty young woman screams hatred of long-dead Hitler and then faints. She is passed over the heads of the throng like a limp rag doll.

There are incidents in Britain as Sir Oswald Mosley, leader of Britain's strutting pre-war Blackshirts, tries for a comeback and other rightist groups voice their demands.

These small but noisy groups preach an anti-Jewish, anti-Negro political line.

LEADER ROUGHED

Mosley himself has been manhandled in the frequent street fighting.

The violence is causing increasing public concern. Pressure builds up on Prime Minister Macmillan's government to ban Fascist street meetings and some want stiff penalties for preaching racial hatred.

Yet this is a field where a democratic government must tread carefully, Home Secretary Henry Brooke asserts. Restrictions on expressions of opinion can limit the entire population's liberty.

Aware of the government's dilemma, Mosley claims to be defending free speech and insists that police protect him.

SUPPORTERS FEW

The new Fascism in its various forms commands the whole-hearted support of probably no more than a couple of thousand people in the entire country.

Among the extreme rightists Mosley is best known.

Mosley, 65, is a baronet, or hereditary knight, and lives in one of London's most fashionable squares. At first glance he might be taken for some peppery retired colonel.

His Union Movement is less theatrical than its pre-war predecessor, the British Union of Fascists. Its members refrain from appearing in public in black shirts and jackboots — because such reminders of Hitler are believed to harm the movement's image.

Mosley disclaims anti-semitism or even a color bias. His enemies call this a sham. He himself says he wants laws which would make Jews, Negroes and most foreigners want to live somewhere else. He claims he could win power by parliamentary means in Britain experienced wide-spread unemployment.

Yesterday we described a hand played between Australia and the United States during the World Bridge Olympiad in Italy in 1960.

At both tables, the final contract was five diamonds doubled, but it was made at one table when the ace of hearts was opened, and defeated two tricks at the other table when the ace of spades was opened. Australia gained 850 points on the deal.

However, an interesting situation would have arisen if either pair had carried on to five hearts with the North - South cards. (The hands have been moved around in order to show South as declarer.)

Let's assume West leads the king of diamonds against five hearts. (An opening spade lead would not affect the result in any way.) Declarer ruffs in dummy, cashes the ace of spades, discarding a club, and trumps a spade. Then he alternately ruffs two diamonds and two spades.

He next enters dummy with the ace of clubs and ruffs the last spade. Declarer having trumped three diamonds in dummy and four spades in his own hand, this is now the position:

North
♥ A 10
♣ J 6

West
♦ A
♣ K 10 7

East
♥ K 9 4
♣ Q

South
♥ Q
♦ 10
♣ 8 5

South leads a club. He has lost no tricks to date. All he has to do is win two more tricks to make the coontract, and the defense cannot prevent him from doing this.

If West plays low on the club lead, Eadt wins with the queen and is forced to return a trump, thus handing South the contract.

If West goes up with the king on the club lead, he catches his partner's queen. Now if West returns a club, East ruffs and is endplayed, while if West returns the ace of diamonds instead, dummy discards the jack of clubs, forcing East to ruff and give dummy the last two tricks
