This is how Kaesong, ancient capital of Korea, looked the last time U. N. troops moved along its main street during a drive on the 38th Parallel. Although now partially destroyed and still held by the enemy, it was agreed upon as the scene for the cease-fire negotiations. Chinese Communists selected Kaesong for the parley as a "face-saving" gesture, according to Allied sources, as Kaesong, with a pre-war population of 56,000, has never been out of Red hands except for a brief period last fall. It was first large South Korean city captured by the Communists, and one of the few footholds still held by the Reds in South Korea.

Gulf Stream Discovery: Its Central Core

By HOWARD W. BLAKESLEE Associated Press Science Editor The Gulf Stream has a central core, 10 to 15 miles wide, running five miles an hour, which is a writhing serpent a thousand miles long. This rushing stream swings in snaky loops as much as 200 miles in a single week. It is faster than the marine charts show, or than shipmasters have believed. It does not always run either where or in the direction they calculate. It is as meandering as the Mississippi River, but without dikes to confine the current. It swings from side to side sometimes at the rate of 10 miles a day. Few rivers have the speed of this Gulf Stream, and none are anywhere near as erratic. In this making face are written some data which scientists hope to use to understand long-range weather forecasting puzzles. These Gulf Stream discoveries were made by the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution, which for years has been studying the stream. The Institution now has its latest expedition out for five months to study the unknown part of the Stream which leaves the Grand Banks of Newfoundland and drifts eastward across the North Atlantic. The central core of fast water sometimes breaks off to form huge eddies, that continue to circle for weeks in a fixed position, while the stream that started there continues uninterrupted one or two hundred miles distant. Why the eddies form is not known. Sometimes cold water from deep down boils up near an eddy. The top waters of the Stream are tropical but the depths are nearly as cold as ice. The eddies run in the opposite direction to the hands of a clock when they are on the outer, or eastern and southern side of the stream. They run clockwise when on the side of the North American shores. In one eddy, which they nicknamed Edgy, Woods Hole oceanographers saw European-bound steamships ploughing ahead against a current of nearly five miles an hour. The skippers thought they were in the Stream flowing toward Europe. They were not aware of the eddy, nor that at that time the stream they thought they were following eastward was nearly a hundred miles north of their course. The weather prospects are for this strange Stream to be a laboratory for understanding the movements of upper air that control the weather. The motor power of the Gulf Stream is the earth's rotation. The same motor power drives the peculiar upper streams of air, which are as surprising as the great water serpent. The rotation drives the recently discovered Jet Stream of air which lies at many miles altitude. This stream runs up to 150 miles an hour. It flows from west to east in the northern hemisphere, the same as the Gulf Stream, but without interference from the North American continent, whose shores deflect the Gulf Stream nearly north along the United States coast. The new expedition is charting the stream as it takes off from the Grand Banks region. Charts show it dividing into two streams. The Woods Hole men believe there are probably three streams. They are using the earth's magnetic field as a lighthouse to detect ocean currents and drifts that are invisible. A ship in a current has no means of knowing which way the current flows, for there are no sharp banks, and no signs of the water's motion. The Woods Hole ship, the Albatross, carries a new instrument, the GEK, trailing astern on a wire. The GEK contains two electric blades, or electrodes. These detect a changing line of force of the earth's magnetic field. They, like the ship towing them, drift across these magnetic lines along with the unseen ocean currents. The crossing of the lines tells the direction and speed of the ocean current.
