

Gentle Manner Of Sudanese Felt Deceptive By Newsmen

A Canadian Press reporter travelling in Sudan finds a deceptiveness in the gentle manner of the people of the African country. He describes how it masks the violence that has split the nation in the last decade.

Since the British departed and Egyptian ambition was turned aside by Sudanese nationalism, the Sudan republic has experienced two revolutions and debilitating civil war—a separatist rebellion by the non-Muslim Negro people in the three southern provinces that has persisted since Sudanese independence Jan. 1, 1956.
