MARY HAWORTH

Bright Child May Be Facing Unnoticed Isolation Problem

Dear Mary Haworth: Our only child is two years old. She is very bright. Already she knows her name, can count correctly from 1 to 12; has memorized her night prayer and is learning the A-B-Cs.

She is very musically inclined, sings nursery songs and dances her own version of the ballet.

Every afternoon when her father and I come home from the office she will ask us to sit with her at the piano while she inventively plays a five-finger exercise. She knows how to operate her little phonograph and can tell you the story of her six favorite records.

It is real fun to watch her do all these things. But the problem, which worries us, is that she doesn't like to do any of these things when we have visitors. She teels so shy that she can't look into people's faces. She has to look down and in fact often covers her face with my dress.

The only outsider with whom she feels at ease is her baby sitter who comes to the house every day. Is there any way to help her overcome this inferiority complex? L.B.

Dear L.B.: Since Eve put on fig leaves, toddlers have been hiding their faces in their mothers' skirts, to avoid direct social encounters with outsiders to the family circle.

Thus your little girl's way of taking refuge from visitors doesn't signify necessarily that she has an inferiority feeling. More likely it is simply a natural baby reflex, designed to give her privacy while she measures the intruder.

However, she may have a problem of sorts that you fail to grasp. She may be leading a rather too isolated existence, cut off from both parents during most of the day, with no brothers or sisters to stretch the horizons of her awareness, and to school her in give-and-take.

Children develop as persons very largely in terms of their sustaining inter-relationships (if any). That's why a warm-hearted family life, as a base of operations, fanning out into daily routine play associations with reasonably well behaved (or well supervised) contemporaries, is practically indispensable to a child's favorable social growth.

It appears that you regard your daughter with admiration, delight and fascination, but more as if she were a precious toy than a helpless mite of humanity, hungrily in need of tender family devotion just because she is alive — and not because she is musical, bright, etc. and therefore a great credit to her parents.

She seems to be making compulsively precocious use of all available opportunities to tickle your fancy with her mental prowess. Which is an unconsciously pathetic bid for real parental love, perhaps.

When a child is manifestly gifted along artistic or intellectual lines, it is particularly advisable for parents to keep the scales gently balanced toward overall normalcy. Thus instead of making a big noise about your daughter's special talents, you should concern yourself rather to help her fit comfortably and unpressuringly into contemporary age groups, as just another little girl.

To get your bearings in that respect, read the Dr. Arnold Gesll, Dr. Francis Ilg classic: "Infant and Child in the Culture of Today" (Harper and Brothers).

Based on years of systematic research in the Yale (University) Clinic of Child Development, this book is of immense practical value to parents (as well as all persons concerned with the training and development of children). It outlines specific techniques for effective guidance and wise psychological care. M.H.

Results Of CAC Tests Are Released

What do you know about electric kettles, household bleaches, children's shoes? These subjects are discussed in the second issue of Canadian Consumer, just off the press, published by the Consumers' Association of Canada.

CAC tested samples of ten brands of widely sold electric kettles, all made in Canada, and recommends one model as the best choice for general use. A surprising number of defects were found in some sample kettles which indicated poor quality control in manufacturing or shipping damage.

Of the 13 brands of household bleaches tested by CAC, all were judged capable of doing the bleaching job for which they were intended, but most of the labels were found inadequate. For example, only two brands warned against the danger of using bleaches with toilet bowl cleaners. Other labels failed to warn that bleaches are poison if taken internally.

CAC reviews the problems of water pollution, a subject of growing concern. The role of household detergents in water pollution has received some publicity lately. CAC finds no evidence that these detergents are a health hazard, merely a nuisance because of the masses of foam found in some streams which get a great deal of sewage and wastes.

The resolutions passed at the Association's Annual Meeting in Winnipeg in June are reviewed in this issue. They form the basis of CAC policy for the coming year. The Food and Drug Directorate has already taken action on resolution requesting tamper-proof closures on glass jars containing baby foods.

Among other information of interest is an article prepared by CAC as a general buying guide for children's shoes. The importance of the proper fitting of shoes is emphasized by medical findings that the proportion of children with foot ills increases from a small 8 per cent at one year to 41 per cent at five and to an alarming 80 per cent at high school age.

Librarian At War Office Offers Tribute

In a recent bulletin of The Margaret Eaton School, University of Toronto, there is a very fine tribute to the late Miss Leita Coddington Worthy. Miss Worthy, an honor graduate of the school, died of a heart attack in December, 1962, in London, England. She had been working there in the library of the war office.

The following is part of a letter included in the tribute. It is from D.W. King, OBE, FLA, the war office librarian in Whitehall, London.

"She had come here every day for the past four or five years and we had come to regard her as one of ourselves. She had at first worked on the preparation of a list of officers for the Royal West African Frontier Force History and had latterly been compiling a regimental index of the War Office History and a regimental index of the War Office Library's biographies.

She had almost come to the end of the alphabetical sequence in the biographies and was going to do a similar index of campaign personal reminiscences. The work she has done in connection with her index has been of the greatest value in preparing bibliographies of individual regiments."

The War Office Library staff sent a floral tribute and were represented at the funeral by Mr.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Fragrant Breezes Sweep A Shower-Washed Valley

There is a light wind in the lawn-trees, a nice breath of zephyr, that croons in the branches. We enjoyed it, and the wide silence behind it, when we came to the front verandah a while ago to watch the shadows of night closing in.

The stream in the low of the valley, kept by its alders, with here and there, a spruce, or a white birch or a berried rowan-tree for good company, dims first. The quiet fields on the slope above become hazy. The woodlands there turn dark. The lights of a passing machine are remindful of a giant firefly, that flits a moment in the dusk and is gone. The evening star appears, glowing steadily — a beacon-light set high over mill and hill.

And you wonder if actually you might wish a wish that could come true what should it be? That would need some consideration. For sometimes the small and little appreciated items of living, if removed, become especially longed for. And those we have always regarded as great, can become increasingly un-important.

Would we perhaps — it was just a thought — wish for a gentle, a smart, willing sort of jinn, who, as our aide, would take a pride in his work in this old house, no matter how humble his tasks? One who would see that no spider presumed to spin a thread from his keep, or allow no single specimen of that pest of season that is "the common housefly" to get in past our modern kitchen doors. Who would, in short, attend to our duties, which are more or less those of the average Island farmwife, so that we might have more leisure to sit idly — "To stand and stare", and enjoy the season at hand.

A genie?

We chuckled at the thought. James would likely this very evening when he came from the barns to settle himself in the old armchair before the lunch-time and retiring, inquire when he opened our chatting, "Well, Ellen, how did you manage to put in the hours today? Did you find the time long? I suspect you did" he will sigh "with so little work now to do."

So the night came down, beautifully, over the recently shower-washed valley of the millstream and the wind that crooned in the lawntrees was perfumed richly with the fragrance of the phlox, now in pretty bloom in the border.

"Remember, September waits now, just over there "a summer guest of the Island observed with a rueful smile this afternoon, pointing toward a green hilltop. "And with September's arrival, our vacation will come to an end. It's back then to home and the work! But let's not think of it so we'll enjoy our every remaining day."

September — and home!

"The best part of our vacation" another remarked the other day, with a twinkle. "Is the day we get the children safely home!"

Scample barks now — James turns away from the door, as a car comes to a stop in the yard.

"Oh, it's you!" he exclaims. "Wasn't I just thinking of you! Come in — Come in! The night is still young" he says.

Until tomorrow — —Diary — Good-night....
