GRIZZLIES IN MANITOBA.

Monstrous in Size, They Still Range the Forests Back in the Mountains. "Fifteen years ago," said Grizzly W. Rae, a Manitoba pioneer, "the grizzly bear was so plentiful among the Manitoba Rockies that the Hudson Bay Company annually secured many hundreds of their skins from the army of hunters and trappers that had its range in that wild region. I have this before me a ponderous bear—nowhere so fierce or so enormous proportions as among the Manitoba mountains—yet is as plentiful in the old haunts, and I doubt if any one now be come upon without a difficulty and tedious journey of at least three hundred miles into the interior wilderness of the province. The grizzly must with almost as hard a fate as the buffalo, although from the nature and position of its present retreats, and the difficulties attendant on hunting and trapping for it, the grizzly bear, like the Manitoba moose, will never become extinct in that country. I believe that the moose, although the flesh of 2,000 of them is required to supply the military stations in the territory above with fresh meat every day, is as plentiful today in its wild retreats as it has been at any time since the great slaughter of an anti-politicians were begun in the territory.

"I know no reason why the grizzly bear of the Manitoba Rockies should grow so much larger than the grizzly of the present day, and I believe that a long and varied experience in hunting these animals in their respective localities has proved to me that such is the case. No grizzly bear I ever captured, or that I ever knew to be captured south of Manitoba, measured more than seven feet in length, and weighed 1,000 lbs. or more. But it was no uncommon thing in the rainy days of grizzly bears in Manitoba for the hunters or trappers to be confronted by one of these monsters, nine feet in length and with a bulk of 1,000 pounds or more. I have seen Manitoba grizzlies that when they threw themselves on their haunches and rose erect, towered five and six feet above me, and I want to tell you that it takes a man with great quantity and the best quality of nerve to stand in that tremendous presence and prepare to do battle coolly and with a level head. Grizzly bears, like all the rest of the bear family, have a curious habit of rising against a tree, and reaching up as far as they can with their forepaws, and then they dig their claws in the bark by digging it with their claws. I have more than once come across these incurring marks of a grizzly as the bear, on the banks of a river, is called, twenty feet above the ground. Imagine coming suddenly upon a bear like that in some deep ravine or isolated spot almost impassable, and you will understand the danger of the situation. The timber heaved and tangled on the ground, and surrounded by rocks and thick underbrush. The sight of his great bulk, open chest and red, and his roaring in fury at you from the enormous head that towers so far above you, is something only to be appreciated when once seen.

"When there were but few bears and persistent hunters of them. When a grizzly and a buffalo met there was something about the contest, although it seldom lasted long, and the buffalo was usually the victim. The buffalo bull, when confronted by a bear, would invariably charge forward, upon its legs and ugly foe. This was just what the bear desired, and he awaited, erect on his haunches, the coming of the buffalo. As the latter rushed forward, with lowered head, and was almost upon the bear, the immense grizzly threw himself quickly to the ground, and with a blow as quick as lightning with one of his great forepaws seldom failed to break his antagonist's neck. A Manitoba grizzly has been known to engage, in rapid succession, four and even five infuriated buffalo bulls, and kill every one of them. It sometimes happened, though, that a bull younger and more agile than his companion succeeded in evading the fatal blow of the grizzly's terrible thrust, and he burst into the bear's side, puncturing the vitals, and making the contest a mutual slaughter.

"In general characteristics, of course, the Manitoba grizzly is not in any way different from others of the family. While I believe that a grizzly bear will sometimes charge a hunter, and fight with a man, and take pains to put himself in the way of one, in a great majority of cases he will take a second thought about the matter, and back out. A queer instance of this disposition came to my knowledge once where a famous Manitoba guide coolly advanced upon three grizzlies, an old one and two half-grown cubs, and by a series of ridiculous monkeyshines and acrobatic manoeuvres within a rapid succession of three grizzlies, filled them with such astonishment and apparent fear that they retreated to the woods as fast as they could go.

"The hunters' gun had snapped in both barrels, he having drawn on the old bear before the younger ones came upon the scene. It was in a fit of desperation that he tried the firing of a hand-spring and jumping up and down, clapping his hands, and resorting to other unimpressive measures. He had been told once that a hunter had frightened a mountain lion away by similar absurd movements, and he found that it worked to perfection in the case of the three grizzly bears, but he never, even in the face of that fact, advised or encouraged any one to go hunting Manitoba or any other kind of grizzlies armed with nothing more than a capacity to turn grotesque somersaults."—New York Sun.

Mastering the Drink Habit. The people of the small island of Okushiri, Japan, have set an example of mastering the drink habit that will commend itself to more pretentious nations. There were only about 200 souls on the island in 1885, and as they subsisted on the profits of fishing during a short season of the year, it followed that idleness and drunkenness filled out the rest of their time. They consumed large quantities of strong drink and so wasted the money they made in the fishing season that many of them suffered for food and shelter during the inclement weather. Realizing to what a stage they had come some of the leaders among them got up a committee to agitate for a law which would pledge to abstain and it was rigorously lived up to, so that within a few years "sake" and "sochu" can no longer be obtained among them. After a trial of five years the prosperity of the island has immensely increased, the population more than quadrupled and the capital invested in the fishing industry increased ten-fold.
