GOALS OF ALCOHOL EDUCATION

"What we are after — both educators and doctors — is to help in rearing a new generation of human beings who are biologically healthy in body and spirit, whose creativeness and sense of social responsibility are given the greatest possible opportunity for expression, who have an unshakable conviction of their own worth and the worth of other people. This is the kind of positive health that we, as educators and medical workers, are after." — Dr. L. E. O. Baumbartner, associate chief of the Children's Bureau, in the "Child's Magazine," August-September, 1950.

The tendency has been from time to time to feel that alcohol education is something apart and different from education in general. However, alcohol education is nothing more or less than a part of the total educational picture and objective. A part of these twelve objectives of alcohol education that these are, in fact, the goals of education per se:

1. To motivate students to seek the lasting and genuine satisfactions of life through healthful living.
2. To develop a sense of pride in having a strong and healthy body and a wholesome mental attitude. The latter portion of this particular objective is one that has tremendous importance as the whole area of juvenile problems is viewed today. Young people are interested in having a healthy body physically because of the emphasis that is placed on athletics, but this matter of "a wholesome mental attitude" is one which has not been given so much attention as might be profitably given to it.
3. To develop an accurate understanding of the effects of alcohol. This is the only one of these objectives as stated that makes any specific reference to alcohol.
4. To develop a sense of responsibility for one's own welfare and that of others.
5. To develop an attitude of respect for the rights of those who have opinions different from our own.
6. To help young people accept the responsibility for making their own decisions on the basis of careful study.
7. To teach young people to do orderly thinking so as to arrive at right conclusions.
8. To encourage a reasonable expression of individuality and expression of respect for their own associates.
9. To cultivate a desire for wholesome recreational activities as a means of satisfying the natural desire for a good time.
10. To help youth see that the right to experiment involves also the accepting of the consequences of those experiments.
11. To develop a sense of pride in the kind of conduct which brings a feeling of self-respect and the approval of worth-while associates.
12. To encourage an analytical attitude toward propaganda of whatever nature, and develop the ability to analyze it on the basis of motives, methods, and objectives.
