attitude in this manner, how would the Canadian College of Teachers operate and what could it be expected to accomplish? After the appointment of the Council the membership would be enrolled. With the central office in Ottawa in close association with the Canadian Teachers' Federation the first year would be spent in establishing the procedures for the selection of members and the development of the program.
At the next convention of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the College would be summoned to meet for one or two days and, as the members would pay their own travelling expenses, the attendance would probably include many of the provincial delegates and those members of the College who lived nearby. In addition to the regular business sessions, there would be discussion periods during which papers on professional and academic topics could be presented or at which addresses would be given by visiting speakers. This sort of activity could do much to stimulate professional growth and it could assist in shaping and clarifying the opinions of the teaching profession about educational problems and policies.

The success of the College would depend, of course, on a number of factors but there is abundant evidence of the need for educational leadership such as it could provide. There is widespread public interest in education and the teaching profession must be prepared to offer considered opinions about problems such as the broad purposes of education, the shape and scope of our educational institutions, the standards and the program of teacher education, the role of the teacher in community life.
One of the most effective ways to perform this service is through an organization that is exclusively professional in the sense that all its members are career teachers, unshackled from the control of lay authorities, and representative of all sections of Canada. Through annual meetings,
