FLASHES OF QUICK WIT.

SOME HISTORIC, SOME APOCRYPHAL, BUT ALL GOOD.

None of the European Sovereigns have been fond of and given to Repartee—Clever and Brutal Tests Passed Among Kingsmen of Long Ago.

Generally speaking, the strong have refused to put up with jesting from the weak. The Czar Nicholas, who had some fine qualities, was hardened against a meditated act of clemency by the undaunted spirit of a prisoner. He had a man of letters, had been implicated in the conspiracy of 1835 and sentenced to be hanged. He was launched from the fatal ladder, when the rope broke and he was thrown to the ground, severely bruised, but conscious. He picked himself up and said quietly, "They can do nothing in Russia, not even when a cord is properly used."

Henry VIII, with all his violence and tyranny, could bear with a retort as well as give one, for he loved a wit. When it was told him that the pope had sent the cardinal's hat to Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, he said, "He may have the hat, but he shall have no head to wear it with," and the bishop was brought to the block. On one occasion the turbulent Earl of Kildare was brought before the king, charged with setting fire to the Cathedral of Cashel. "I own it," said the Earl, "but I never would have done it had I not believed the archbishop was in it." Henry laughed and pardoned the culprit. His bitterest enemy was the Bishop of Meath, who accused him to Henry of doing mischief, and closed his arraignment with "Thus, my liege, you see that all Ireland cannot govern the Earl."

"Then," said the perverse monarch, "the Earl shall rule all Ireland," and instantly made him lord deputy because his good humor equalled his valor.

Elizabeth resembled her father in her willingness to put up with retorts from saucy subjects and to pay them back in kind—not always with the greatest refinement. The little scene with the ill-fated Earl of Essex, when she boxed his ears for insolence and laid her hand on his sword, saying that he would not take such treatment, even from her father, is familiar to every one.

Going back to still earlier dates, we constantly find the imperious Platanos, kings giving food, and receiving reports that bear witness of great independence among some of their powerful subjects. It was Edward I, who, on the refusal of the "Black Dog of Warwick" to join the king with vassals and supplies for war, said to the Earl, you shall either go or hang. The retort was, "Sir Rex, I will neither go nor hang."

Henry IV, of France, was good natured above most monarchs in repartee. As he made it impossible to reproduce in conventional English dress the jests of this wise and witty king. On one occasion it was the turn of M. d'Anbigne to sleep in the king's ante-chamber. Fancying the monarch was asleep, he began to talk to M. de la Force, who shared his watch, saying, "Your master is the most grateful of men." La Force, half asleep, asked him what he was talking about, when Henry cried out, "Wake up! he is telling you I am the most ungrateful of men."

"Pray go to sleep, sire," interrupted d'Anbigne. "We have a great deal more to say about you," Henry never showed less kindness to his servant on account of what he had overheard.

But the cynical generosity of Frederick the Great is unique. A lackey who owed him a grudge had determined to poison him. One morning he brought in the king's chocolate and appeared visibly troubled in countenance. "What ails you?" said Frederick, looking fixedly at him. "You look as if you had put poison in my food." The wretch fell at his feet and avowed his crime. "Get out of my sight, you scoundrel!" said Frederick, and took no further notice of his attempt to murder him!

A delicate compliment is a work of far higher art than the most biting sarcasm. Everyone knows the story of the poor creature who found himself seated between Mme. Recamier and Mme. de Stael, and managed to offend them both by saying that she sat between wit and beauty, and was crushed by the retort of Mme. de Stael that he possessed neither. The court of Louis XIV, was the school where this art was brought to perfection. The flattery offered to the king was at once coarse and exquisite. Witness the inimitable reply of Mignard, who was painting the king's portrait for the tenth time, when Louis asked him, "Do I look older?" "I see a few more campaigns on the brow of your majesty."

One of Louis' marshals, Bassompierre, was great at repartee. He had spent ten years in the battle, and, on emerging, his majesty asked him his age. "Fifty, sire." To the surprised look of the king the marshal added, "I don't count the ten years I spent in the battle, because I did not spend them in my majesty's service."

Louis found amusement in Bassompierre's retorts—a curious illustration of pleasure that is sometimes derived from remarks that might reasonably be supposed to be far from flattering. On one occasion he was telling the court how he first entered Madrid as ambassador. "It was mounted," he explained, "on the very smallest mule in the world."

The king remarked, "It must indeed have been an amusing sight to see the biggest ass in his nine weeks' experience in this country."

MONNET-SULLY.

The Celebrated French Actor.

The features of Monnet-Sully are familiar to Canadians, as the great actor, during his American tour, played to delight and amaze in this country. Monnet-Sully is a man of the passions to the life, and there is a subtlety, an intellectuality in his delineation which places him in the front rank of great players. Monnet-Sully is a patron of the famous "Vin Mariani," and it is thus that great actor speaks of it—"When we drink the wine, we are giving a new dream of the future, of glory, of the infinite. In fact, nothing can be better for strengthening the brain and nerves, and giving a new lease of life to those who were disposed to cultivate a morbid pessimism. If you desire to know something about the celebrated actor who has spoken admirably of 'Vin Mariani,' send your name to Lawrence A. Wilson & Co., Montreal, and they will send you an album containing their portraits, free.

BLOOD-MAKING WISES.

The public have recognized the fact that the only brand of wine that has stood the test of time, and is now being sold in this country, is the famous "Vin Mariani," and it is thus that great actor speaks of it—"When we drink the wine, we are giving a new dream of the future, of glory, of the infinite. In fact, nothing can be better for strengthening the brain and nerves, and giving a new lease of life to those who were disposed to cultivate a morbid pessimism. If you desire to know something about the celebrated actor who has spoken admirably of 'Vin Mariani,' send your name to Lawrence A. VOWEL, CONSONANT, SYLLABLE.

Some Fresh Definitions of Great Value

A Melville Bell, of Washington, in his note on "Syllabic Consonants," said: "What is a vowel? What is a consonant? What is a syllable?"

"A vowel is defined as a non-frictional emission of voice, unvocalized, breath, through an oral channel with momentarily fixed configuration. Vowels, therefore, run smoothly into one another by merely altering the shape of the oral passage without interrupting it."

"A consonant is defined as an interruption of the breath, or voice, by oral stoppage, or by emission through narrow channels. The change from one consonant to another thus involves a motion of the articulating organs, producing, with more or less audibility, a puff, a flap or a sibilation."

"The two classes of elements meet in ee, y, oo, w. A syllable is any vocal element uttered with a single impulse of voice. All the vocal elements in a syllable must be clustered together, without admixture with non-vocals, but any number of non-vocals may precede or follow the vocal cluster without affecting the syllabic unity."

"The consonants l, m, n, when they are used as consonants, frequently form syllables without vowels, as in bottle."

"The test of good pronunciation is to give each syllable its own distinct sound, so that in the most rapid utterance the ear can trace the boundaries of every syllable. But the syllabic sounds must be true to customary pronunciation."

"The name consonant, if held to imply an element that cannot be pronounced by itself, is a misnomer, or, at least, would be a misnomer, and its use should, in that case, be discontinued in scientific terminology. Vowels are the soft and plastic substance of speech; consonants are the articulations or joints which connect the syllables. Their proper name is, therefore, 'articulations,' not consonants."

"Phonetic elements make syllables. Syllables make words; words are to be considered as the syllables of clauses. Clauses must be carefully individualized, for they are the syllables of sentences. Divide your sentences into their logical units, or clauses; and indicate within the clauses all their phonetic units or syllables, and you will fill the grand fundamental precepts of delivery."

Tennyson's Flowers.

Tennyson speaks of "a skin as clean and white as privet when it flowers," and truly the privet with its trim leaves and small white flowers looks a very Puritan for neatness and simplicity. References to the flowers of our gardens of course abound, and many will occur at once to the Tennyson reader. The rose and the lily play more than a commonplace part in "Maud," where, indeed, all the flowers are interesting spectators of the drama. Passages such as "A walk of rose ran from door to door, A walk of lilies crost it to the tower," from the Idylls might have been written by many others; and bell flowers, though we may be grateful to Tennyson for preserving the old-fashioned name "Canterbury bells," are easily paralleled from many poets. Perhaps the beautiful line, "Love like an Alpine harebell hung with tears," deserves an especial mention, he has written a poem to the snowdrop, which is styled "February fair maid," and it forms a fitting part of his picture of "St. Agnes Eve," which, as W. E. Henley has pointed out, is so daintily pure in its whiteness, and a contrast to Keats' brilliantly colored poem on the same subject.

Of the early spring, with its violets, primroses and crocuses, our poet is never tired, and has avowed his especial love for April, being an Elizabethan in this in many other things, so that it is surprising to find comparatively so little mention of the daffodil. It is hardly to be found anywhere except in "Maud," and "The Sunnet to the Nineteenth Century." Here in this romantic moon of daffodil and crocus. Perhaps Tennyson felt that it had been so fully celebrated elsewhere as to become hackneyed, in spite of all its beauty.—Good Words.

A New Arithmetic.

The lady who came into the bookstore was one of the very primmest and most particular.

"Have you any arithmetics?" she inquired stiffly.

"Yes, madam," replied the polite clerk.

"What kind?"

"Any kind you wish, madam. We keep a complete stock."

"Well, I want an expurgated edition. 'I beg your pardon?' gasped the clerk.

"I want an expurgated edition. I desire it for my daughter, who is just beginning that branch of study."

"I don't think quite understand you, madam," stammered the poor clerk.
