Opening lead—queen of diamonds.

A low diamond was played from dummy, East played the six, and South the king. After two rounds of trumps, the A-K of spades were cashed and a spade ruffed. Dummy was then entered with a diamond and the last spade was trumped.

South now exited with the nine of diamonds, hoping West would have to take the trick and be compelled to lead a club. The plan would have succeeded except that West had been shrewd enough on the second diamond play to dispose of his jack of diamonds.

As a result, East won the diamond nine with the ten, returned a club, and South was defeated.

Dealer's play was good, but not good enough. He had the right idea in stripping dummy of spades in order to throw the lead to West and thus avoid a club finesse.

The execution, though, was not as perfect as it might have been. South gave the show away. His scheme of operation became an open book as soon as he started to ruff out dummy's spade losers. He made it too easy for West to recognize that a throw-in play was coming. The result was that West avoided the endplay.

The plan to rely on the endplay rather than the straight club finesse was fine. But South should have carried out the plan without shouting it from the rooftops.

The best play is to win the opening diamond lead with the king and promptly return a diamond. West would have to be rather inspired to play his jack of diamonds at trick two. If he makes the mechanical play of the four of diamonds, he is a deceased pigeon.

The diamond play has to be made before West has any idea of what is happening. West can't really know so early in the play that the critical point of the hand has been reached. But whether he knows or not, he should be put to the test as early as possible.
