China's Planners Expect To Make Peiping Big Inland Port
PEIPING (Reuters)—Communist China's planners hope to see Peiping, the sea, become an inland port as a result of new waterways and channel being constructed around the capital.

But the immediate purpose of these canals is to ensure that the supply of water is maintained at a constant rate and in sufficient quantity for the growing capital, which is being turned from a purely consuming city into a production center.

Water has always been a problem in Peiping, and the site of the city has been changed several times since a town was first established here more than 2,000 years ago. Sometimes there is too much water and sometimes too little, for the rains come to this dry dust bowl in a few heavy downpours and it frequently happens that one-quarter of the annual rainfall of 23 inches may fall in one day.

Thus, the problem of drainage during the rains often has been acute. Engineers hope to remedy this at the same time as they solve
