Hugh M. Bonham, a prominent young lawyer, was attacked this morning by Jack Queever, County Court Clerk, John L. Shipe and his son Sam, all prominent citizens of Clinton. Bonham was struck over the head by Sam Shipe; when he attempted to defend himself Queever and the two Shipes fired on him with pistols, five balls taking effect, three in the breast and two in the head. Bonham fought desperately, and before he was overpowered had stabbed Queever in the arm and face, shot Sam Shipe fatally in the abdomen, and seriously if not fatally stabbed John L. Shipe. The trouble occurred about some slanderous language used by some of the parties about Miss Edmondson, daughter of Tax Collector E. W. Edmondson.

A Young Hero's Death.

A letter received at Plumstead, near Manchester, by the mother of Thomas Martindale, a young soldier killed in Basutoland, from the Captain of his corps, gives the following story of "his death":—"Madam,—It is with sincere sorrow that I find myself obliged to inform you that your son, Thomas Martindale, has died of a wound received in the assault on Moirosi's stronghold here. He was shot through the left thigh. There was just a chance that his life would be saved by amputating the limb, and the operation was performed by a skillful surgeon, but the poor lad died immediately afterwards from exhaustion. He suffered very little—indeed, he did not suffer at all under the operation, which was, of course, performed while he was under the influence of chloroform. He was a noble boy, and his early death is, I assure you, deeply regretted by all his comrades of all ranks in the regiment. He was enthusiastic in the discharge of his duties, and in the fight of April 8 he distinguished himself so much that I then and there mentally resolved that if we both lived through it, it would not be my fault if he did not receive the first commission that might fall vacant. He received the wound which caused his death in trying to place a wounded comrade under cover from the enemy's fire. He was indeed a real hero. As I held him in my arms while the doctor bound up his wounds on the field, he whispered to me, 'Won't you say I did my duty, sir?' I am not ashamed to confess that the tears came into my eyes as I tried to answer the poor lad cheerfully. He was buried with military honors, besides others, his comrades, who fell in the same fight."

Hanlan's Departure from Newcastle

From the Newcastle Chronicle, June 28th.

The departure from Newcastle of Edward Hanlan, the champion sculler of England and America, was yesterday morning signalled by a demonstration of a kind altogether exceptional in the annals of aquatics. Between three and four thousand people found their way within the precincts of the railway station, and the crush on the general platform and on the enclosure was simply extraordinary. When the champion was recognised in the streets on his way to the station, crowds gathering at every step followed him, cheering and expressing hearty good wishes as he went along. Arrived at the station, it was only by dint of the greatest exertions that the party could make their way from the ticket office to the train. A special force of railway policemen had to be organized in order to drive a passage through the crowd; and when Hanlan had been safely landed on the departure platform, these officials had to form a cordon around him, so as to keep off the press.

We need scarcely say that the cheering and enthusiasm which greeted the champion as he stepped into a first-class compartment, almost begged description. Loud cries for a "few words" arose from the vast assemblage, and Hanlan, whose modesty and reticence of speech are well known, needed some persuasion from his friends before acceding to the request so generally made. At length he motioned his hand for silence, and said it was from no desire to retain silence that he had so long resisted their call, but that his heart was really too full to express the feelings with which he regarded the people of Newcastle generally, and especially those who had by their kindness made his stay so pleasant, and had come, perhaps at some personal inconvenience, to bid him farewell on his departure. In all his wanderings he had never met with a people more warm-hearted, more hospitable, and more willing to do justice, and even to honor a stranger. He could say no more than that he should never forget the generous people with whom he had spent such a pleasant time, and he thanked them all very heartily. With reference to any future championship match, Hanlan said he would be very glad to row at Toronto any sculler who would choose to come out, but it was his intention to defend the Cup, and whether at Toronto or on the Tyne or Thames he was ready to meet all comers. About five minutes before the time of the train's departure a singularly pleasant episode occurred. Loud cheers from the crowds outside heralded the approach of the late champion. The people opened out a lane for Elliott and his companion Ralph Hepplewhite, of Elswick, and as the former came through the crowd, many pats on the back and expressions of approval greeted him for the good taste and friendly feeling which impelled him to see his successful rival away on his long homeward journey. Elliott advanced to the carriage amidst such a scene as has rarely, if ever, been witnessed within this fine building, and Hanlan, on his approach, stepped out, and the two scullers warmly shook hands. Elliott wished the Canadian a pleasant voyage, and hoped that on his arrival at home he might find his family well, and the people of Toronto as appreciative of a good sculler as were those he was just leaving. Hanlan was labouring under considerable emotion and could make but small response to Elliott's greeting, but his manner was nevertheless full of kindness, and the meeting between the pair was altogether very pleasant to witness. The moment for the departure of the train now arrived, and the champion, after a final farewell with Mr. Chris. Barrass, stepped into the carriage; the doors were closed and the train moved away. The cheering and enthusiasm were renewed as the wheels got into motion, and Hanlan, bending out of the window, acknowledged, hat in hand, the greetings which from all sides were showered upon him. After the champion had departed, upwards of two thousand people gathered round Elliott as he left the station. Cheers were raised for him, and he was accompanied to the house of his old friend Mr. Brownlee by the major part of the assemblage.

The portrait bust of Hanlan, modelled in clay by M. Gustave Pingal, of the Science and Art School, Corporation street, Newcastle, has just been finished.
