THE PIRATE.

By Sir Walter Scott.
CHAPTER II.

At such times, therefore, all the sources of amusement which the country afforded, were open to the younger Mervoun, who, in these intervals of his education, had an opportunity to give full scope to the energies of a bold, active, and daring character. He was often engaged with the youth of the hamlet in those desperate sports, to which the "dreadful trade of the samphire-gatherer" is like a walk upon level ground—often joined those midnight excursions upon the face of the giddy cliffs, to secure the eggs or the young of the sea-fowl; and in these daring adventures displayed an address, presence of mind, and activity, which, in one so young, and not a native of the country, astonished the oldest fowlers.

At other times Mordaunt accompanied Sweyn and other fishermen in their long and perilous expeditions to the distant and deep sea, learning under their direction the management of the boat, in which they equal, or exceed, perhaps, any natives of the British empire. This exercise had charms for Mordaunt, independently of the fishing alone. At this time, the old Norwegian sagas were much remembered, and often rehearsed, by the fishermen, who still preserved among themselves the ancient Norse tongue, which was the speech of their forefathers. In the dark romance of those Scandinavian tales, lay much that was captivating to a youthful ear; and the classic fables of antiquity were rivalled at least, if not excelled, in Mordaunt's opinion, by the strange legends of Berserkers, of Sea-kings, of dwarfs, giants, and sorcerers, which he heard from the native Zelanders. Often the scenes around him were assigned as the localities of wild poems, which, half recited, half chanted by voices as hoarse, if not so loud, as the waves over which they floated, pointed out the very bay on which they sailed as the scene of a bloody sea-fight; the scarce-seen heap of stones that arched over the projecting cape, as the dun, or castle, of some potent earl or noted pirate; the distant and solitary gray stone on the lonely moor, as marking the grave of a hero; the wild cavern, up which the sea rolled, in heavy, broad, and unbroken billows, as the dwelling of some noted sorcerer.

The ocean also had its mysteries, the effect of which was aided by the dim twilight, through which it was imperfectly seen for more than half the year. Its bottomless depths and secret caves contained, according to the account of Sweyn and others, skilled in legendary lore, such wonders as modern navigators reject with disdain. In the quiet moonlight bay, where the waves came rippling to the shore, upon a bed of smooth sand intermingled with shells, the mermaid was still seen to glide along the waters by moonlight, and mingling her voice with the sighing breeze, was often heard to sing of subterranean wonders, or to chant prophecies of future events. The karaken, that hugest of living things, was still supposed to cumber the recesses of the Northern Ocean; and often, when some fog-bank covered the sea at a distance, the eye of the experienced boatsman saw the horns of the monstrous leviathan walking and waving amidst the wreaths of mist, and bore away with all press of oar and sail, lest the sudden suction, occasioned by the sinking of the monstrous mass to the bottom, should drag within the grasp of its multifarious feelers his own frail skiff. The sea-snake was also known, which, arising out of the depths of ocean, stretches to the skies his enormous neck, covered with a mane like that of a war-horse, and with his broad glittering eyes, raised mast-head high, looks out, as it seems, for plunder or for victims, amidst the walking and waving amidst the wreaths of mist, and bore away with all press of oar and sail, lest the sudden suction, occasioned by the sinking of the monstrous mass to the bottom, should drag within the grasp of its multifarious feelers his own frail skiff. The sea-snake was also known, which, arising out of the depths of ocean, stretches to the skies his enormous neck, covered with a mane like that of a war-horse, and with his broad glittering eyes, raised mast-head high, looks out, as it seems, for plunder or for victims, amidst the walking and waving amidst the wreaths of mist, and bore away with all press of oar and sail, lest the sudden suction, occasioned by the sinking of the monstrous mass to the bottom, should drag within the grasp of its multifarious feelers his own frail skiff.

Such legends are, indeed, everywhere current amongst the vulgar; but the imagination is far more powerfully affected by them on the deep and dangerous seas of the north,—amidst precipices and headlands, many hundred feet high,—amidst perilous straits, and currents and eddies,—long sunken reefs of rock, over which the vivid ocean foams and boils,—dark caverns to whose extremities neither man or skiff has ever ventured,—lonely, and often uninhabited isles,—and occasionally the ruins of ancient northern fastnesses, dimly seen by the feeble light of the Arctic winter. To Mordaunt who had much of romance in his disposition, these superstitions formed a pleasing and interesting exercise of the imagination, while, half doubting, half inclined to believe, he listened to the tales chanted concerning these wonders of nature, and creatures of credulous belief, told in the rude but energetic language of the ancient Sealds.

But there wanted not softer and lighter amusement, that might seem better suited to Mordaunt's age, than the wild tales and rude exercises which we have already mentioned. The season of winter when, from the shortness of the daylight, labor becomes impossible, is in Zetland the time of revel, feasting, and merriment. Whatever the fishermen has been able to acquire during summer was expended, and often wasted, in maintaining the mirth and hospitality of his hearth during this period; while the landholders and gentlemen of the island gave double loose to their convivial and hospitable dispositions, through their houses with guests, and drove away the rigour of the season with jest, glee, and song, the dance, and the wine-cup.

Amid the revels of this merry, though rigorous season, no youth added more spirit to the dance, or glee to the revel, than the young stranger, Mordaunt Mervoun. When his father's state of mind permitted, or indeed required his absence, he wandered from house to house a welcome guest wherever he came, and lent his willing voice to the song, and his foot to the revel. A boat, or if the weather, as was often the case, permitted not that convenience, one of the numerous ponies, which, straying in herds about the extensive moors, may be said to be at any man's command who can catch them, conveyed him from the mansion of one hospitable Zeland-er to that of another. None excelled him in performing the warlike sword-dance, a species of amusement which had been derived from the habits of the ancient Norsemen. He could play upon the gusle, and upon the common violin, the melancholy and pathetic tunes peculiar to the country; and with great spirit and execution could relieve their monotony with the livelier airs of the North of Scotland.

Germany and Russia.

The North German Gazette, in an inspired article, on the relations between Germany and Russia says: "The duty imposed by Germany's policy in the interest of the Empire and its dignity is to maintain peace as long as it is compatible with honor. The starting point of an endeavor in this direction is found only on the ground covered by treaties. The circumstance that the otherwise successful peace policy of the German Government has for three summers past been distributed by Bulgaria and its princes is not calculated to attract the good will of German politicians towards that principality. It accords with the interests of the peace-loving and no less straight-forward German nation that Germany should, in the Councils of Europe, throw her whole weight into the scale in order to have Europe commend peace to ambitious Bulgarian princes and ministers, who are inclined to set the continent in a blaze. Germany holds firmly to the treaties which have been broken by the princes of Coburg and Battenberg, not for the sake of pleasing the other powers, but out of regard for her own signature, for the peace of Europe was placed at stake through the Coburg-Orleans enterprise. There is not even the semblance of an excuse for that enterprise, and it is only to be explained on the understanding that the Coburg-er is the executor of an exclusively Orleansist policy."

American Railroad Speed.

There is an impression on this side of the Atlantic that railway accidents in America are mainly due to the craze for swift travel which characterizes our cousins in the new world. In reality the American trains travel, as a rule, much more slowly than ours, and with a less average of casualties than is yearly put at the doors of the English railway companies. For instance, the express trains between New York and Albany average only twenty-nine and two-eighths miles per hour, though the track is almost level, while the Flying Scotchman averages 50 miles over a considerable part of the distance between London and Edinburgh. Between New York and Boston the speed is rarely over 32.3 miles an hour, though the course is much easier than that between London and Manchester, which is sometimes traversed at the rate of 49.35 miles an hour. The speed is, indeed, only attained by one American line—that may be called the "Limited Mail," between New York and Chicago, which charges a heavy extra fare for the accommodation afforded. Taking them all round, the best English exceed those of America fully 25 per cent. in speed.—London Standard.

Give them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.
When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not to be there, your lungs cannot half do their work. And what they do they cannot do well.
Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption or any of the family of throat and nose and head and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German Syrup, which any druggist will sell at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

The Sugar Duties.

The St. John Sun says that a good deal of indignation is expressed because certain Scotch sugars imported into Canada, which are paying duties $2.79 per 100 pounds, may be sold in competition with home refined sugar. The fact that the home refiners pay about $2 in duties on the sugars from which they produce 100 pounds of refined is kept as far as possible in the background. But $2.79 per 100 pounds is not the highest duties ever paid in Canada. In 1875 the duty paid on refined sugar, Sir Richard Cartwright being our authority, was $2.875 per 100 pounds. In 1876 it was $2.689, according to Hon. David Mills, the price for export of American sugar (white and brown) averaged in 1878 $6.26, whereon the duty would be $2.561. The unfortunate consumer of sugars was in no better way under Cartwright than he is now, and yet every refinery in the country was crushed out of existence.

"THE last lot of Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam is nearly gone, and you can make us another shipment of twenty-five gross. We have never sold any such preparation that gives such universal satisfaction as Adamson's, and the demand is constantly increasing. Geo. C. Dowdwin & Co., 38 Hanover St., Boston. ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural quiet sleep by relieving the child from pain; and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhoea, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, and take no other kind. mar17 eod & wky

JAMES J. GAY & SON have now, and will have, for just a few market days, a superabundance of cucumbers, cauliflowers and small onions for pickling, and in consequence can sell them at very moderate prices. Do not make the mistake of last year. In a very short time the frost will snap them all up, and you will be biting your fingers off because you did not buy when you could do so cheap.
