ADAM BEDE.

CHAPTER XVIII

Grand old man, laughing at his deep little wench, slowly transferred the stick to his left hand, which held the gate open, and slowly thrust his finger into the waistcoat pocket on which Totty had fixed her eyes with a confident look of expectation.

And when they were all gone, the old man leaned on the gate again, watching them across the lane, along the Home Close, and through the far gate, till they disappeared behind a bend in the hedge. For the hedgerows in those days shut out one's view, even on the better managed farms; and this afternoon the dog-roses were tossing out their pink wreaths, the nightshade was in its yellow and purple glory, the pale honeysuckle grew out of reach, peeping high up out of a holly-bush, and, over all, an ash or a sycamore every now and then threw its shadow across the path.

There were other acquaintances at other gates who had to move aside and let them pass; at the gate of the Home Close there was half the dairy of cows standing on behind the other, extremely slow to understand that their large bodies might be in the way; at the far gate there was the mare holding her head over the bars, and beside her the liver-colored foal with its head toward its mother's flank, apparently still much embarrassed by its own straggling existence. The way lay entirely through Mr. Poyser's own fields till they reached the main road leading to the village, and he turned a keen eye on the stock and the crops as they went along, while Mrs. Poyser was ready to supply a running commentary on them all. The woman who manages a dairy has a large share in making the rent, so she may well be allowed to have her opinion on stock and their 'keep'—an exercise which strengthens her understanding so much that she finds herself able to give her husband advice on most other subjects.

'There's that short-horned Sally,' she said, as they entered the Home Close, and caught sight of the meek beast that lay chewing the cud, and looking at her with a sleepy eye. 'I begin to hate the sight of the cow; and I say now what I said three weeks ago, the sooner we get rid of her the better, for there's that little yellow cow as doesn't give half the milk, and yet I've twice as much butter from her.'

'Why, thee't not like the woman in general,' said Mr. Poyser; 'they like the short horns, as give such a lot o' milk.
There's the Chowne's wife wants him to buy no other sort.'

'What's it signify what Chowne's wife likes? a poor sort thing, wi' no more headpiece nor a sparrow. She'd take a big cullender to strain her lard wi' and then wander as the scratchin' run through.

I've seen enough of her to know as I'll niver take a servant from her house again—all hunger-magger—and you'd niver know, when you went in, whether it was Monday or Friday, the wash draggin' on to th' end of the week; and as for her cheese, I know well enough it rose like a loaf in a tin last year. An' then she talks o' the weather bein' i' fault, as there's folks 'ud stand on their heads and then say the fault was i' their boots.'

'Well, Chowne's been wantin' to buy Sally, so we can get rid of her, if thee lik'st,' said Mr. Poyser, secretly proud of his wife's superior power of putting two and two together; indeed, on recent market days, he had more than once boasted of her discernment in this very matter of shorthorns.

'Ay, them as choose a soft for a wife may's well buy up the short-horns, for if you get your head stuck in a bog, your legs may's well get after it. Eh! talk o' legs, there's legs for you,' Mrs. Poyser continued, as Totty, who had been set down now the road was dry, toddled up in front of her father and mother. 'There's shapes!
An' she's got such a long foot, she'll be her father's own child.'

'Ay, she'll be welly such a one a Hetty i' ten years' time, on'y she's got th' colored eyes. I niver remember a blue eye i' my family; my mother had eyes as black as sloes, just like Hetty's.'

'Thee child'll be none the worse for havin' sunnat as isn't like Hetty. An' I'm none for havin' her so over pretty.
Though, for the matter o' that, there's people w' light hair an' blue eyes as pretty as them w' black. If Dinah had got a bit o' color in her cheeks, an' didn't stick that Methodist cap on her head, enough to frighten the crows, folks 'ud think her as pretty as Hetty.'

'Nay, nay,' said Mrs. Poyser, with rather a contemptuous emphasis, 'thee dostna know the pints of a woman. The men 'ud niver run after Dinah as they would after Hetty.'

'What care I what the men 'ud run after? It's well seen what choice the most of 'em know show to make, by the poor draggle-tails o' wives you see, like bits o' gauze ribbin', good for no thing when the colors gone.'

'Well, well, thee castna say but what I know'd how to make a choice when I married,' said Mr. Poyser, who usually settled little conjugal disputes by a compliment of this sort; 'and thee wast twice as buxom as Dinah ten year ago.'

'I niver said as a woman had need to be ugly to make a good misis of a house.
There's the Chowne's wife ugly enough to turn the milk an' save the rennet, but as for Dinah, poor child, she's niver likely to be buxom as long as she'll make her dinner o' cake and water, for the sake o' giving to them as want. She provoked me past bearing sometimes; and, as I told her, she went clean against the Scripp, for that says 'Love your neighbor as yourself'; but I said 'if you loved your neighbor no better nor you'd do yourself, Dinah, it's little enough you'd do for him. You'd be thinkin' he might do well enough on a half empty stomach.' Eh, I wonder where she is this blessed Sunday! sitting by that sick woman I darsay, as she'd set her heart on going to all of a sudden.'

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Beware of Insanity!

Sir,—Permit me to inform you that some individual has perpetrated a libel which appeared in your last EXAMINER, concerning the missing of mails between Georgetown and Murray Harbor. Sir, I can certainly prove there has not yet been a mail misad with the present mail courier.
Surely the venomous individual is insane.
Therefore I hope the public will immediately attend to the matter and save f
