

Japanese Retain Same Job Throughout Whole Lifetime

By FORBES RHUDE

Canadian business men probably would be startled if they were suddenly called upon to face the normal obligations of their counterparts in Japan.

This includes, in some instances, the task of finding husbands for female employees. The husband-finding job and other peculiarities of Japanese industry were outlined by Franklin E. Feltz, professor of industrial management, Harvard Graduate School of Business, at the recent business conference of the University of Western Ontario.

"During his lifetime," Prof. Feltz commented, "a Japanese never works for more than one employer. The company he first goes to work for when he gets out of school is the company from which he retires in his old age."

"If you ask a Japanese what he would do if he were offered a more responsible job in another company at higher pay he would not understand you.

NEVER FIRED

"No Japanese ever would make him such an offer and to leave the place where he now is employed is beyond his comprehension. Why should he ever consider that? He knows he never will be discharged. He has cultivated for the duration. This has always been so and is so. He knows it, his employer knows it, everyone knows it."

More than 90 per cent of Japan's 465,000 industrial firms have less than 50 employees, Prof. Feltz said, and the busband-supply chain occurs in this area.

"Take the case of a Kyoto lacquerware producer. An owner-manager will have a half-dozen men and perhaps three times as many girls working for him, whom he has recruited through a common schoolmaster in a small community back up-country.

"The girls go to work as learners and during the first three years receive almost no wages. They live together in a dormitory which the employer supplies. From the fourth through the seventh year the girls receive regular wages and their housing and food still is provided by the employer.

"But at the expiration of the seven-year period each girl will be provided with a good and worthy husband. It was part of her understanding when she went to work."

Some Progress Is Reported In Battle With Drug Traffic

By KARSTEN PRAGER
SINGAPORE (AP) — The plane from Hong Kong had customs officer she did not mind being searched. But half way through the frisking she paled. The policeman had discovered half a pound of heroin in her breast.

The incident represents a small victory in Southeast Asia long battle of wits against the illegal narcotics trade.

Hill tribesmen raise their spears as mountain sides and carry their cash crop out into Thailand and Burma in well-armed caravans of up to 100 men.

Government authority is negligible in the highlands. Government patrols often find themselves on the losing end of a gun battle with the smugglers.

And so the opium moves south, by truck and bus, by buffalo cart and railroad to Bangkok, Rangoon, Phnom Penh and Saigon.

Plane and ship routes then lead to Singapore, generally considered the main distribution point for the illegal global narcotics trade.

Officials estimate that roughly 60,000 pounds of opium pass through Singapore alone in the course of a year. Last year customs grabbed about 2,000 pounds here.
