ELLEN'S DIARY

Horse And Cart Gather Fire-wood For Winter

Quietly, James entered the piggery this morning, while the night lights still glowed softly there. We saw the younger summer come from his house across the lane to join him, more hands being required, so to cater speedily to the several breakfasts, to eliminate thus any undue fuss or concern.

"One loss!" James reported at breakfast. "He was one, I thought from the first, not born to live, Ellen, they seem to come that way: either noticeably to thrive and grow, or else marked young to die."

We nodded — we that have come up the years with James at his farming.

"Well, this will be another lovely day for them" we said.

Leaves gilded by the sunshine carpeted the yard; birch and maple intermingled by the paths about. At the far side, past the house across the lane, the poplars caught the gold in their remaining coins of leaves.

Ths was an afternoon to lift the gladioli — the gifts of spring that had bloomed so beautifully through September. And the geraniums, their neighbors, friendly plants and rewarding, whether grown indoors or out.

"You should see the geraniums bloom out in our Californ- is sunshine — you just can't keep 'em down! It's as though they have an idea folks need 'em so they catch and grow and blossom, just any old place — we recall a visiting friend from there once say.

"I can't understand why folks from California, an always summerland of state, should wish to come north to visit our Island unless it would be in the warmth of midsummer" one of the family commented today of a lady, a Californian by adoption, aunt of the children in the house across the lane, and at present its guest —

A small woman and attractive, this is. Daughter of an Island farm, a stenographer by profession, mother and grandmother, widowed — and obviously much pleased, after years of absence to be revisiting in her holidays, the once-familiar scenes, and to catch up on the lives and living of the former schoolmates and young friends, she in her girlhood knew.

"But she is an Island girl at heart. She enjoys all its seasons" we said.

Delightful these days are which observe her visit, full of that enchantment, which only Autumn "down on the Island" can give.

Three lily bulbs, we buried today in a basement border, below the kitchen windows to the east. We planted them with some ceremony, giving them on especial caress and breathing a wish that they might grow well and having survived every adverse wind of circumstance open their white buds for us and all, in a summer ahead.

Tidying up — that is what James was pleased to do, hitching the horse in the farm-cart today Then away they went along the fields, to gather up extra loads of firewood, bringing them home to woodshed and cellar to be a comfortable backlog, maybe when the March winds sweep down upon us, gusty and cold, across the northern countrsyide.

But tonight knows no such winds. Balmy, it is, summer-like; and over the mill to add to the prevailing charm, close by a star, sails October's own young moon.

Until tomorrow — — Diary — Good-night....
