Vice President and Actuary:
WILLIAM H. BEERS, JR.
HEAD OFFICE 112 & 114 Broadway, N. Y.

General Agent for the Dominion of Canada:
WALTER BURKE, Esq.,

The New York
Life Insurance Company
OLDEST INSTITUTIONS

Of the kind in America, having been chartered in the year 1841, and commenced business in May, 1845.
During the twenty-three years of its existence, it has issued policies upon the lives of more than Fifty Thousand Persons. and has paid in losses $5,000,000 to the families and representatives of those who have deceased while members of the Company.

Annual Income
EXCEEDS
Four Million Dollars.

A SAFE INVESTMENT.
The instances are many within the experience of every Life Insurance Company, in which the proceeds of a Policy has saved from poverty the survivors of those who have thus made provision for their wants in times of prosperity and health. A wife may insure the life of her husband for her own benefit, and should she survive him, the amount of the insurance will be payable to her free from any claims against his estate; and in case of the death of the wife before that of the husband, the amount of the insurance may be made payable to her children.

THE COMPANY DECLARES
ANNUAL CASH DIVIDENDS which are available in payment of each Annual Premium. All the insured in this Company receive dividends which can be used in part of the second and each subsequent Annual Premium thereafter; or the dividend may be allowed to accumulate, and subsequently used in whole or in part in the payment of Premiums. The business of the Company being PURELY UTILE, each member pays the average cost of insurance, all surplus being annually returned to the Policy holders.
(Companies having a Stock Capital usually retain a large portion for the Stockholders.) The Dividends paid to Policy holders exceed $3,000,000.

Endowment Assurance Policies.
These Policies are coming into general request As a sure and profitable investment for one's declining years, they deserve the attention of all.
The sum secured by an ordinary life policy becomes available upon the death of the insured; on the other hand, if the amount is received by the insured himself upon his attaining a specified age, while full provision is made for death occurring prior thereto.

THE NON-FORFEITURE PLAN.
This company originated and introduced the valuable feature known as the Non-Forfeiture Plan, the amount of the insurance being paid in the form of regular payments, and has revolutionized the system of Life Insurance in the United States, and which has been adopted generally in a less favorable form by all Life Companies. A party, by this table, after the second year, cannot forfeit any part of what has been paid in.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Just as I 'spected," muttered Bart, when he awoke, only a short time after Searle had left him, and found himself alone. Some strange hunter's instinct had warned him that the camp was unguarded, and he had been restless and uneasy until his sleep came to an end.

"Just as I 'spected," the boy has gone and done it, as it was his nature to go and do. I was sartin that suthin' of this kind was goin' to happen arter mornin'; but that was no use in me keepin' awake all night, 'cause he'd only hev waited, and played the joke off on me some time when I was obliged to sleep. When he has got his head set onto anythin', he is bound to go through with it, and it seems that that ain't nothin' in nature to stop him. In course he has put off into the hills, arter the gal, as fast as he can go, and all I've got to do is to foller him up. I don't believe the boy has got sense enough to hide his trail from me."

The old man treated himself to a light luncheon before commencing his search, and then, after examining the "sign" about the camp, followed Searle's trail down to the creek.

He grinned as he perceived that the young gentleman had entered the creek, and proceeded to follow it up on the bank, carefully noticing each side, to see where the young gentleman had come out.

For two hours he followed the stream toward its head, retracing his steps several times, and becoming more perplexed the further he went. At last, having gone a long distance without seeing the slightest sign of a trail leading from the creek, he could not avoid coming to the conclusion that he had taken the wrong direction.

"Either the boy is powerful fond of the water," said he, "or he has got more sense than I gave him credit for. He has been with me long enough to 'earn a little suthin' and I reckon he has fooled the old con this time. Wal, I know about what he's pintin' for, and I must jist go thar and look for him. I wouldn't have him hurt for a power of money."

Having thus decided, the old hunter hastened off into the hills, towards the west, hoping that he might be able to "head off" his charge, or overtake him before he could get into any serious mischief. He saw nothing of the young man, however, nor did he get upon his trail until late in the afternoon.

He was not slow to follow the trail when he had discovered it, and it led him on, further up toward the mountains until he observed that it was crossed by another.

"Just as I 'spected," he muttered, as he examined both trails. "He has found the gal, or the gal has found him. That little track was never made by a man's hoof, and George's track I know well enough, for it shows whar I patched his moccasins."

As Bart followed the trail, it was not long before he perceived that Searle had been in the advance, and that the girl had been following him. By carefully examining tracks, wherever the ground was soft enough for the feet to leave an impression, he could almost read the very thoughts of those whose trail he was pursuing; but he was obliged to admit that he was puzzled in this instance. Knowing that Searle had been following the girl, he was unable to account for the fact that she had become to all appearance, the pursuer.

"I'm kind bent, and that's a fact," he muttered, shaking his head dubiously. "If they war two men, I thought red the sign; but thar's no countin' on anythin' for sure when women folks are about. 'Ye've a notion that I will see token of some kind of a scraper arter long."

His prediction was soon verified. He came to a place where the trail was broken and the ground, discolored by blood and beaten and trampled, gave evidence of a severe struggle. Here he paused, and examined the traces closely, to determine what had happened.

"Red-skins hev been about, and somebody has been tied," he thought, as he picked up a bit of cut thong. "It must hev been George who was tied, and they wouldn't hev tied him if he was killed.
He wasn't bad hurt, either; for thar goes his trail, and the gal's, too, along with the red-skins."

As there could be no doubt that Searle had been captured by the Blackfeet, Bart followed the trail, which was now plain enough, until it brought him into a valley in which he discovered the Indians encamped. Climbing one of the heights by which the valley was shut in, he reached an eminence from which he had a good view of all that was going on below. It was night when he attained this elevation, and he could do nothing but rest until morning.

In the morning he kept a close watch upon the encampment; but saw nothing of Searle, nor any indications of his presence in the valley, until he caught sight of the girl who had brought the young gentleman into trouble, and noticed that she went toward the other end of the valley.

Following her with his eyes, he watched her until she disappeared at the foot of the cliff. Then he worked his way cautiously and laboriously, along the side of the height, and brought himself near enough to the upper limit of the valley, to see a hole in the rock, guarded by two Indian warriors.

"Whar the gall goes, thar George is to be found," was his muttered conclusion.
"Those two red-skins will hev to suffer to-night."

The old hunter watched his chance as if his life depended upon it. Not only did he wait until night, but waited until the night was far spent, until he supposed that the senses of the Indian guards would be deadened by their long and sleepless ward.
Then with his ax in one hand and his rifle in the other, he crawled silently toward the mouth of the cave, where one of the Blackfeet was asleep, and the other was keeping watch by his side.

Stealthily as a cat he approached, marking his victim, and buried his ax in the brain of the waking Indian, who fell without a murmur. The other sprang to his feet, just in time to meet the point of Bart's knife, which silenced the cry that had risen to his lips.

Stepping over the slain savages, he entered the cave, and found it empty. After a close scrutiny, becoming satisfied that the object of his search was not there, he passed out, shaking his head solemnly.
Seeing a rifle lying by the side of one of the Blackfeet, he picked it up, and perceived that it was the fine double-barreled rifle which had belonged to George Searle.

"They've got him by ginger!" he exclaimed, as he left the place with the weapon. "The next question is, whar is he? That question has got to be answered fore I quit this trail, sure as my name is Bart-holler-mew."

Returning to his station at the side of the valley, he waited until morning, when he discovered that the Indian village was nearly deserted. He had noticed a number of warriors leaving the valley during the early part of the night, as if going on the war path, and it was now evident to him that they had gone for the purpose of attacking Henning's fort.

"Mighty sorry that I can't be thar," he thought, "to help the whites in that skrimmage; but business comes before pleasure, and my business jist now is to find George Searle. It ain't likely that they've got him with them, and I may get a sight of either him or the gal, if I keep on a watchin'?"

There was a great disturbance in the village when the bodies of the two Black-feet were discovered at the mouth of the cave, and two horsemen soon went galloping down the valley; but Bart saw nothing more that particularly attracted his attention, until a little after noon, when there came riding into the valley a burly and red-faced white man, whom he at once recognized.

Struck by a new idea, Bart Swannick left his perch, and hastened, by a short route, to a point which he thought Barteau would be likely to pass, if he was going toward the fort. He had hardly concealed himself and taken breath, when the old man made his appearance, riding slowly along.

"You've got to stop thar, and that's a fact," said Swannick, as he stepped out with leveled rifle.
