ELLEN'S DIARY

Sees Final Gathering-in Of Crop At Alderlea

On a farm, it seems fitting to reach the end of some seasonal work with a weekend. There is much satisfaction in the harvest-time to have last sheaves gathered in, last measures of grain stored, or indeed any endeavour completed before its twilight moves in, bringing in its peaceful train the Sunday of rest. So it was that we this evening were happy to know that with this week's close had come also the final gathering in, of all the crop at Alderlea.

The sowers had gone forth under the bright promise and hope of the springtime and sown. Providence having given them sun and shower and the increase, they had reaped of their faithfulness. Now the harvest-home at this farm was completed.

"And so the crop is saved!" we smiled as Mack our nine-year-old when this afternoon he brought us word of a last load of turnips being stored.

He nodded, "Yes, but if we don't happen to get our plowing done, what about the next crop?" What of the next crop? The plowing will follow—the winter spring will come, and the seed-time. The cycle of farming will continue.

This week favored the field-work, indeed encouraged a new work of the farm. And now all about the colors have faded. Most of summer's leafy branches are bare. Sere leaves lie in gold or brown heaps quietly, or restless when mournful autumn winds blow.

Odd grass-fattened cattle, our farmers sent-out to market this week, those that had made more and less gain on the summer's continuing lush pastures. Mack was among those of the family attending the out-going, seated blithely between his grandfather and the driver of the many-wheeled truck which carried the animals away. It is an experience highly satisfying these times for a small fellow to ride in such a splendid chariot, the bigger the better it seems.

"Now there," James commented one day last summer when we excursions along smiling countryside "is what I'd call a good cut of hay! Yes, there'll be an amount of feed taken off that."

"And" one of the youngsters piped up breathlessly "did you see that road-machinery we just passed? Man, I should like to be at the wheel of one of them!"

And James smiled and offered half-teasingly "To a farmer, what are such machines compared to a good field of hay? Nothing... nothing at all... I guess I must be living in the wrong age. It's too old I am" he chuckled. But James is not old because:

"He is not old who looks on barren boughs

And sees the hidden beauty of returning spring.

He is not old, whose ears can hear the vows

Of love the wildbirds whisper when they sing.

But he is old, no matter what his years,

Whose heart is not attuned to Nature's ways;

Whose eyes are blinded, and whose deafened ears,

Keep him in hibernation all his days."

Until Monday — — — Diary. Good-night.
