ELLEN'S DIARY

Silken Wind And Sunlight Lift The Winter's Coverlet

Granddaughter checked over the remaining weeks of the present college semester this afternoon and was a little surprised to find a few days left over now left.

"And what, what a long, lovely day! I shall have a smile. 'Holiday' James exclaimed with a twinkle. 'Not with all the farm-work that ahead! There'll be tractor to drive in the field. And in the hay is are you forgetting? There'll be that horse to manage in the lot!'"

"Do you hear that, Girl? Mack teased.

There are busy days ahead. And for her and the older group of the grandchildren the play-time is over. There will be no more happy times in the play-house down where the orchard drives away from the house. Nor will believe fancy on September Island, the altered isle up the which had been the stream.

Canada scene — they halt in this days in passing. Robin, the juncos, in a bluish-grey drift, visited the lawn; today it is the sparrows and juncos who flights to display the attractive incisions of white in the spread of their tail-feathers.

There was promise of continuing mild weather in the silken wind which with the sunlight lifted the worn ragged coverlet of winter away from the beds. And noting this she spoke of the miracle, the span of one spring can be effected.

"What were we doing this time last Saturday?" Mack queried coming through the door this morning. Then he answered his own question: "We were digging around in the garden. It was a storm! And look now — there's little of it left. Baking, eh?"

"Don't put a cake — a white one." "Don't put it left frosting on the ad." File it high.
