(Published by Request.) EDUCATIONAL IDEALS. Part I.—The Ideal Man.

Writing more than 2400 years ago Plato asked: "Is not that the best education which gives to the mind and body all the force, all the beauty, and all the perfection of which they are capable?" This was his idea of the "best education": is it ours? If not, wherein do we differ? What is our ideal?

This question I must leave to you to answer. My acquaintance with the practice of our school system is too slight to warrant me in forming an opinion. All that I will venture to attempt this evening is to direct your thoughts towards the consideration of another question. What should we aim at in this matter of education? What should be our Educational Ideal?

The word "educate" suggests a drawing out of the subject some latent powers. But what powers? What powers ought a man to possess? and how far is the function of education to provide for their development? Let us endeavor to find an answer to these two questions,—to formulate our ideal man, and then consider how he is to be produced.

Evidently any ideal of manhood must embody this idea of force; for man is what he is in virtue of the powers he possesses. One individual differs from another in that he does, or can do, certain actions which the other cannot do as well or at all. Even distinctions of form and feature derive their significance from the fact that they suggest degrees of grace and power in action.

Further, we observe that the force displayed finds different modes of expression; so different, indeed, that we require special terms to mark the distinction. Thus we are accustomed to speak of man as displaying muscular force, intellectual power and emotional energy. (Such classification is doubtless open to objection, inasmuch as all these forces alike find expression not only through the agency of the physical organism, but it will serve our present purpose.)

In virtue of his muscular strength a man can transport himself from place to place, can lift weights, and effect changes in the material world about him. Moreover it is through the muscular changes of the body that the higher forces of humanity find expression. Not only is intellectual effort dependent upon the constitution and activity of the tissues of the brain, but the loftiest and purest emotions that the human soul is capable of are developed and exercised only through the agency of the body. The muscles of the hand may be used to forge into shape a piece of yielding steel, or to convey to a fellow-being, by their clinging tenderness, the deepest sympathy or the purest love.

In formulating our ideal man we must, therefore, realize the important part that the body plays in the human economy.

As definite ideas on this point are essential to the formation of our ideal man, let us briefly consider some of the essentials. To begin with, we must realize that a man cannot form an intelligent idea concerning a fact of which he has no conscious perception. He is consciously only to the extent to which he is aware of it. A boy of ten may be able to read Herber Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy, but he cannot form an intelligent idea of its teaching; simply because he cannot grasp that which is not conscious of the ideas therein set forth.

To gain intelligence a man must primarily be trained to exercise his powers of observation, and to receive impressions from the world about him. He must learn to see deep and far, and to see and hear not only what is apparent to the grosser senses but also that which can only be discerned by the more refined faculties of his consciousness, in the nature of his own feelings, and in the nature of the feelings of others.

The man who has traveled widely and has had many opportunities of observing the world about him, and who has had the aid of his imagination made the experiences therein embodied to a greater or less extent his own, has all the better equipped for the study of the world about him. He is provided with a greater number of measures with which to reach a better understanding. Similarly, residence in a large university offers to the student other advantages quite as important as those which are connected with his class work. A young man brought into contact with men of the higher culture and scholarship and listening to their oft repeated confessions of ignorance is enabled to arrive at a better understanding of his own capabilities than if he had not had such measures to assist him—and thus discernment of his own powers will tend to the intellectual advancement.

We must strive to recognize these facts in all their bearings.

Another essential to intelligence is imagination. This is a wonderful faculty, the most wonderful of all man possesses. In virtue of it he not only attains to an understanding of the world about him, but he is able to create. To this faculty we owe not only the conceptions of Aristotle, of Bacon, of Newton, and of every other great intellect, but also all the inventions, all the labor-saving appliances which render modern civilization possible, all the splendid idealizations of the past, the now inspiring mysteries of Egyptian architecture, Michael Angelo's dream as materialized in the dome of St. Peter's—those matchless expressions of mean that the physical organism is the groundwork of the whole human system. But though this be the case it by no means follows that physical force is the highest expression of human energy. The powers of the mind are of a distinctly higher order. It is in virtue of his faculty of reasoning that man takes the rank he does that he is enabled to control, to direct, to open up the domain of knowledge, of invention; that gives significance to life, and enables us to conceive of states of being in comparison with which the mortal existence is but a momentary effort, consciousness lost in the infinities of time and space. All this we owe to the faculty of imagination. Every child of man possesses it, and just in proportion as it is trained and exercised can he attain to the higher levels of intelligence. By its aid the world of the next and all succeeding generations will be conditioned, the new problems which present themselves to the intellect of the future will be moulded and fashioned, for remember, the world's idealists are ever its prophets and saviours.

In conceiving of our ideal man, must we not take account of this faculty of imagination. Another factor essential to intelligence is judgment, power of deduction, whereby a man through a process of analysis and synthesis, arrives at a definite conclusion. It is this faculty that we seek to develop by the study of Geometry, that is when this is utilized, not merely to exercise the memory, but to enlarge the measuring power of the mind, and it is only in proportion as this last is carefully trained, and its powers developed that it can be called upon to perform its duties aright. It is this faculty that we seek to develop by the study of Geometry, that is when this is utilized, not merely to exercise the memory, but to enlarge the measuring power of the mind, and it is only in proportion as this last is carefully trained, and its powers developed that it can be called upon to perform its duties aright.

Let us take the case of a young person in such an extent that he can break through the barriers of his own nature, and finally only in proportion as he can by the aid of his reasoning faculties reach definite conclusions, as, for instance, to decide whether his love is to a greater or less degree material, intellectual or spiritual. Only in this proportion can he be said to display intelligence. Remember at the best his mental grasp of such an experience will be very inadequate, he will be dimly conscious of the existence of such a thing that he cannot express, but his power to attain to a more or less definite understanding of its significance will be a true measure of his intelligence. For intelligence, power depends upon clearness of perception, thoroughness of analysis, care in comparison, power of imagination and soundness of judgment.

There are many men whose understanding does not go beyond a narrow range of experience, but who, through the aid of their intelligence, are able to grasp the nature of things, and to express their thoughts in a clear and definite manner. They are able to see the nature of things, and to express their thoughts in a clear and definite manner. They are able to see the nature of things, and to express their thoughts in a clear and definite manner.

But even intellectual power in all its fullness is not the highest expression of a very displayed by man. In speaking of such and such individuals you say they have been enough satisfied but no heart. What do you mean? It is not that the persons in question have little or no emotional capacity, or only that of a low order. It is not the manifestation of such emotions as love, pity, sympathy, usefulness, admiration, suggests that man is possessed of a power of expression higher in degree than that which can be reasonably ascribed to a purely animal nature. Though to a careless observer the majority of men exist in a state of unconsciousness, or the equally mechanical task of adding up columns of figures, or of recording transactions in writing, yet the veridical materialist will hesitate to see in such a state the end of all human intelligence. Even the humblest toiler may have a home, and therein may find affection, sympathy, and companionship, which will afford him numberless experiences infinitely more important than those connected with his daily task, which last is, indeed, only endurable in so far as it enables him to secure the first. Upon him may devolve the responsibility of cherishing the little ones, of moulding and fashioning their lives, and by such efforts he may develop in his life and in his character and power which we have reason to believe will last, not only for time but also for eternity. However lowly be his lot, such experiences may reveal to him the most momentous of all truths, in comparison with which the discoveries of a Newton are of little or no account, namely that "the Highest dwells in him" that the Sources of Nature are in his own bosom, something which for want of a better term we shall call the soul.

Speaking in this connection Emerson says: "The philosophy of six thousand years has not searched the chambers and magazines of the soul. In its experiments there has always remained, in the last analysis, a residuum which it could not resolve. Man is a stream whose source is hidden. Our being is descending into us from we know not whence,"—and again, "all goes to show that the soul in man is not an organ, but animates and exercises all the organs; is not a function like the power of memory, of calculation, of comparison; but uses these as hands and feet; is not a faculty but a light; is not the intellect of the will but master of the intellect and the will; is the background of our being in which they lie—an immensity not possessed and which cannot be expressed."

Every man has a soul, though some men have not awakened to a knowledge of the fact. When you say such an one has no heart, no soul, you do not wish to deny to him the possession of that organ which fulfills the duty of forcing his life blood through his veins, or of the inherent properties of manhood. The idea you seek to convey is that, in this man, the higher faculties of humanity find no expression. He is spiritually dead, dying. And it is not important that these faculties shall be developed—shall be exercised? In the daily struggle for existence the true issues of human life are too often forgotten, and the measuring of the ideal man, can we ignore this need? We deny that soul development should have a fitting place and suitable recognition in any system of education worthy the name of distinctly common and object of human existence and life will not be worth the living. The importance of spiritual development is far transcends that of the intellectual or physical. The heavens are above the earth.

Thus our ideal man, intended, however, for every day use, should possess a physical development adequate to meet every requirement of his nature, measured not by quantity and last, but not less, spiritually, that force which found its highest expression in the life of Jesus of Nazareth, and minor expression in every true, pure, unselfish, heroic action which, in all ages and in all people, has borne witness to the fact that man is potentially divine.

Accepting this as a feeble suggestion of an ideal, how is it to be reached, and how far is it the function of education to provide for its development? (Continued on Saturday.)

BIG PRICE FOR A DOG. Fifteen hundred pounds for a collie is not a bad price, as no doubt Mr. Stretch, of Ormskirk, thought when he obtained that figure at the Liverpool show for his champion Ormskirk Emerald. Mr. Megson, of Manchester, was the purchaser, and the actual sum in hard cash which changed hands was £1,200, the balance being paid by throwing in all Champion Edgemoor Marvel, for which Mr. Megson had paid £300, so that the actual price paid for the Ormskirk dog was £1,700. This beats the record for collies by a long way, the highest price previously paid being £1,000 for Champion Christopher and £1,600 for Champion Southampton.

Mr. Stretch is to be congratulated on getting so good a price for his dog, while Mr. Megson, the "collie king," is also to be congratulated in getting such a good dog for his money.—Liverpool Courier.

(The Mr. Stretch referred to in the foregoing extract is a cousin of Mr. T. J. Harris, of the London House.)
