BULLETINS FROM BIRDLAND

WINIFRED E. WILSON

CROWNED HEADS

If you think that only human beings are crowned you are greatly mistaken. Although there is no coronation service, quite a number of birds are crowned. There are Golden-crowned and Ruby-crowned Kinglets, Black-crowned and Yellow-crowned Night Herons, White-crowned Pigeons, Orange-crowned Waxwings, Golden-crowned and White-crowned Sparrows.

These last two are large for Sparrows, and regal looking, worthy of a coronation. The Golden-crowned is a western bird, breeding only as far east as the foothills of Alberta. What could be more monarch-like than a gold crown? Yet this is a duller coloured species than the White-crown, which has a black head stripe and a black capped dark brown and pale grey. Its wings are trimmed with dark scallops edged with pure white like the white on its head. Hardened indeed is the person who gets no thrill on coming upon a group of White-crowned Sparrows standing in a stately manner as they feed on the ground or in piles of cut brush.

This suit is possible for us when the species is in migration. It generally crosses our southern border during the first three weeks of May and again in October, and is then most likely to be found in the same type of country as it chooses for nesting grounds: small willows close to streams or lakes, and open, grassy areas with nearby brushy cover.

Occasionally the White-crown is confused with the Whitethroat. But even at a distance, when the birds are at rest, several points of difference are apparent. The first we notice is posture. We might really say "pose", for that is surely an attribute of the regal White-crown. The colouring is lighter, but particularly clear is the central, white head stripe, at all times wider than that of the Whitethroat. Sometimes it is wider, because the White-crown has the strange ability of partially expanding its crown to form a low white crest. The head is oddly shaped, with a sloping forehead.

The clinching feature is the yellow spot in front of the Whitethroat's eye and missing in the White-crown which, instead, has the white stripe at the side of the head continue above the eye.

As the regal bird usually nests near large settlements, we seldom hear its sweet, plaintive voice, or see its bulky nest of twigs, grass, and bark, thickly padded inside with rootlets and hairs, to hold 4 pale green, brown spotted eggs.

Do all birds swim alike?

CHAPTER XV

Continued

He looked down at her with a somewhat rueful smile at this prophecy.

"In that case I suppose I'd better hurry up and get the picture done first," he said.

"That is what I think," she told him, returning his gaze with serious eyes. "There is much paper for drawing in the Residency, and if you make it soon and give it to Gappie Sorenson he will take it to the Government and they will put it in another book. And when all men know what Arafat looks like maybe more ships will come."

"Maybe they would," he agreed gravely. "Well, we'll have to see what we can do about it. But just now, we'd better get a move on. I'll be back before we're half-way through the plantation."

She nodded and rose to her feet, and he set down the boulder-strewn slope, with its patches of dense pandanus scrub and areas of course, razor-edged grass. The girl followed a pace or two behind him, picking her barefooted way with the ease of long practice over the rough, stony ground.

They had accomplished what they had set out to do, but it had taken them all day and had proved a strenuous and exhausting trip. This was due to the peculiar formation of the island rather than to the actual distance they had covered, for though the hills seldom rose to more than a height of 300 feet above sea level, their way had taken them across half-a-dozen rocky ridges of approximately that height. The ridges themselves were not particularly difficult to negotiate, but the deep valleys lying between them teemed with rank jungle vegetation, and the task of forcing a passage through the dense undergrowth of fern and creeper in the intense steamy heat, was one that had slowed up their progress very considerably.

They had started on the opposite coast shortly before midday, and had then explored its length as far as the headland which formed the island's north-western extremity. They had found no trace of the deserted village — nor, indeed, of anything else of interest — and they had returned by a different but equally difficult route.

Thurlow had enjoyed the trip, but as he led the way in among the ordered ranks of palms in the gathering dusk he found himself admitting ruefully that he was nearer a solution of his own particular problem than he had been when they set out. He had been thinking it over at intervals all day, and had set out the case in his mind with admirable clarity but though his commonsense and his instinct for safety pointed the way clearly in one direction, an entirely illogical reluctance to follow these guides kept him hesitating and deferring the final decision.

His obvious plan, he told himself, was to fall in with the trader's ideas — as Porson had done. It would ensure a life of comparative ease for the time, and he felt that he had earned that much after what he had gone through in the last two years. After all, the ethics of the case need not worry him, for from all that he knew to the contrary, the real Thurlow might have taken the same decision. Admittedly things were in a rotten state on the island as far as its native inhabitants were concerned, but if the New Zealand Government chose to exercise no kind of supervision over its outlying territories, that was their look-out. With any sort of luck things might go on indefinitely in this way — as they had for Porson — and the longer he was left alone the less chance there would be of his real identity being discovered in the end.

No doubt, there would be a fuss when it was ultimately discovered that the wrong man had been holding down the job all the while; but he had the doctor's report to cover him there. And as he was not the real resident, they could hardly blame him for failing to reform a system which had had the backing of his genuine predecessor.

The only alternative to this course was far less attractive. It was that he should take his false position seriously and endeavour to institute reforms and administer the island in accordance with what he conceived to be the ideas of the Government. That would mean declaring open war upon Strang and ensuring a whole host of troubles for himself. And to what end? True, if the Government should decide to replace him in the near future, in spite of the doctor's favourable report, it might count for something to be able to show that he had endeavoured to carry out the duties wrongly entrusted to him with some degree of conscientiousness. But he suspected that that would weigh very little in the official minds compared with the question of his mistaken identity, which would then be exposed.

Thus narrowed down the inevitable choice seemed plain enough — and yet he could not make up his mind to it.
