ELLEN'S DIARY

Wood Fire Lullabies To Sleep The "Auld Ones"

"The mountain wears a cap," we chuckled to the farmer who came by on an errand this morning. "Oh! Mack said softly. What do we do at Alderlea on a showery night like this? Enjoy the coziness of the wood-fire and the gentle rhythm of its burning. Rhythm! It is a perfect lullaby, a sweet and drowsy tune, to carry these two "auld ones" off presently to wander hand in hand along some green and flowery avenue of sleep. Until tomorrow — — — Diary — Goodnight."

"Yes, comfortable" he nodded. This morning while the showery rain waited beyond the misty hills, was a time for farmers who had known the structure for long and longer years, who had scriptural lessons opened to them by young and older ministers in turn, to forgather in a company to the "Old Kirk" at the corner. This time not clad in Sunday best but in everyday garments to assist there at a current work of repair.

Adding another chapter to church history, the edifice was lifted to allow for the insertion, not of stout hewn stills or sawed this time but of modern foundations. And James, with Rob too among the helpers, minded many an incident and scene in connection with this church at the corner from remembered years now long past.

He spoke of happy companions of his youth, scattered now, separated widely from each other as are those older who once worshipped there, translated to eternal dwellings "prepared" though we are assured "not made with hands."

"High" Mack questioned, evidently unable to reconcile the work with the quiet he finds in his Sunday attendance there. "Yes, she's lifted to quite a height!" James replied, indicating the distance with spread hands. They must have room to work at the foundation you see." "Oh!" Mack said softly. "What do we do at Alderlea on a showery night like this? Enjoy the coziness of the wood-fire and the gentle rhythm of its burning. Rhythm! It is a perfect lullaby, a sweet and drowsy tune, to carry these two "auld ones" off presently to wander hand in hand along some green and flowery avenue of sleep.
