

Chinese Student Enthusiasm For Mao Writings Is Puzzling

In the following story, Per Kronvall, 19, a Swedish student journalist, reports some of his observations and experiences during a recent month-long stay in China with a Swedish educational project.

It is hard to understand the fantastic enthusiasm in Communist China for the works of Mao Tse-tung. Newspapers there are filled with stories about people all over the world reading the writings of Mao.

The Paris correspondent for the Peking People's Daily reported that a group of Chinese students in the French capital was asked by a French youngster for a picture of Mao and inquired in his story whether this was not proof that it was only a question of time before the French would begin to study (Communist party) chairman Mao's works.

In Peking I met a New Zealander, Ravi Alley, who took part in the revolution and has been in China since 1926. I asked him what Mao's works had done for the Chinese people.

"Very much good," said the pro-Communist New Zealander.

In Mao's writing he gives examples of how you should look at your work, he explained. Mao tells small anecdotes and helps people get certain working spirit that they need, he added.

HUSBAND NEVER HOME

He gave an example: The wife of a brigade leader in Shensi complained that her husband was never at home to play with the kids and that his salary was just as high as everybody else's. She refused to mend his clothes and he always got cold food when he came home late. Then she got a copy of Mao's works, started to read them, and realized that she had been unjust to her husband. So she went and cooked a nice meal for him, repaired some of his old working clothes.

Later, on a train to Shanghai I talked with a passenger, an old man. He told me, through a Chinese engineer who served as an interpreter, that before the liberation he was a rickshaw driver, but then the day came when he was told that he should burn his rickshaw.

"You can't imagine how it is to burn the torture instrument that you had dragged around for years," the old man said. "Now I am going on a train trip down to Shanghai to spend some time with my son. He is one of the harbor captains."

University Has Staff Shortage

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. (CP)—Memorial University, expecting a full-time enrolment of about 4,000 students this fall, is spreading its staff of about 250 thinly to handle all classes.

Dr. Leslie Harris, dean of arts and sciences, was asked in an interview this weekend whether the university was facing a shortage of staff. "We are by no means over-staffed," he said.

He explained the ratio of staff to students in North America was one teacher for 10 students. In the British Isles it was one teacher for 12 students. But at Memorial it is one teacher for 20 students.

The university has added about 40 new faculty members this fall. There were no changes in heads of departments, but it was announced earlier that Sarah MacGlashen is to be the first dean of women at Memorial this year.

Besides the estimated 4,000 full-time students, about 1,000 part-time students may register. First lectures will be given Sept. 19.

Think of it, before the revolution, he would have been a rickshaw driver, or a coolie, and have very little good. Thanks to Chairman Mao, he has a good and responsible job and I get 65 yuan a month as pension. I hope the revolution will come soon to the rest of the world."

LIVE DIFFERENTLY

Chinese youths also live a different life. In Shanghai I visited a big brick house, once belonging to an English bishop, which had been turned into a "children's palace" where members of the Communist Youth League, the Pioneers, assemble after school. I was met by applauding children, ages 7 to 18. Inside the building the first things that met my eyes were slogans and political cartoons, anti-American and anti-imperialist, and of course, Mao Tse-tung posters. In another room on the ground floor was a device training the children to shoot down American planes. I tried myself and found it difficult.

Upstairs I was taken into a room where little girls about 10 or 11 danced and sang songs such as: We'd Like to Strangle You. L. B. Johnson and Thank You, Chairman Mao, for the Electric Light.

"The children are so keen on reading Mao Tse-tung's works," my guide told me.

"Be serious, children at that age don't like to read books on historical analysis," I said. "I've read it in translation, and I can assure you that it's no reading for a kid of 11 or 12 years old."

"Do you want to ask one of the children?" my guide asked me.

Even though I knew what the answer would be I asked a girl, through my translator: "Well, how do you like chairman Mao's works?"

She said she thought they were very interesting and entertaining and she had read them for three years.

Japanese Making Progress After Slow Start In Space

By RENE-GEORGES INAGAKI
TOKYO (AP)—His first rockets were so tiny they were nicknamed Itokawa's Pencils.

Prof. Hideo Itokawa of Tokyo University and Japanese missile technicians were forced to watch the United States and the Soviet Union get a head start in the space age. Allied occupation authorities prohibited the manufacture of rockets in Japan.

When the occupation and the ban ended, Itokawa began experimenting with pencil rockets less than nine inches long. His test had more the air of a man playing with toys. But that was 250 rockets and 10 years ago.

Now Japan's technicians are well advanced in the business of rocketry. They have great hopes of making Japan the fourth country in the world (United States, Russia and France are the others) to place a satellite in orbit with one of its own rockets. The first Japanese space vehicle could start circling the earth next month.

Japan's space program is pegged to peaceful research but it has political and military implications that undoubtedly have led the government to push it.

BACKED BY STATE

Space exploration in Japan is supervised and subsidized by the state. But rocket development and testing for peaceful purposes have been almost exclusively the work of Tokyo University's Institute of Space and Aeronautical Science.

Itokawa, 53, is a giant in Japan's aeronautical world. He served as an engineer at the Yakuhwa Aircraft Company which made most of Japan's Second World War planes. In 1948 he became a professor in Tokyo University's engineering department.

Rockets he designed were sold to Yugoslavia and Indonesia. His institute has announced plans for a test flight this fall of a Japanese-made four-stage rocket called a Lambda-SS. It is expected to reach a height of 200 miles or so.

The projected Lambda-4S will carry a Titanium globe, 18.7 inches in diameter with a cone containing measuring instruments, as its last of four stages. This object will weigh 84 pounds. It is possible it may go into orbit.

STUDY CONTROL

However, the placing of such a satellite into orbit, officials say, would be incidental to the main purpose of the flight, which they describe as a test of a position control device. The total cost for all Japanese space projects last year was about 3,000,000,000 yen ($10,000,000), of which $6,800,000 was spent by Itokawa's institute. Its annual budget was only $1,000,000 six years ago.

Institute officials say the low cost is due to the use of Japanese-developed solid fuel instead of more expensive liquid fuels for the rockets.
