As a Grain of Mustard Seed.

BY AN OLD CONTRIBUTOR.

It was a bleak December evening, freighted with icy winds, blind with the blackness of a coming tempest. Rachel Simmons drew her scanty shawl closer around her as she hurried down the street, where the wind had already blown out half the flickering gas lamps.

"There is no light in father's window," she thought. "Or, at least, none but the faint shine of the fire. Father is getting more absent-minded than ever. To forget to light the gas!"

She smiled to herself as, with her little key, she opened the door, beside which glimmered the white-painted sign, "Apartments to Let," and hastened in.

Seba Simmons sat before the fire staring into the bed of dying coals. Rachel went up to him, and placing one hand on his shoulder, leaned down to kiss him.

"Thee's tired to-night, father dear," she said cheerily. "Thee hasn't lighted the gas, and look how low the fire is!"

Friend Seba rubbed his hands together nervously.

"Yes, I am tired, Rachel," he said, "but thee has not guessed right after all. The gas is not lighted because the man has turned it off. Hush! I don't blame the man. He only did his duty."

Rachel colored.

"We are behind only a quarter," she said. "The destruction of the poor is their poverty," quoted Friend Seba. "Has thee any candles in the house, daughter?"

"I can run out to the corner store for a pound, father."

"Thee had better. And while thee is about it, Rachel, order a pail of coal. I put on the last at three o'clock."

"Poor father!" murmured Rachel, as she hastened on her errand.

"Coals?" said the fat proprietor, "and candles, Simmons, eh? There's nine dollars against them on the books, David. Better shut down on that sort of thing."

"Oh! I guess it will do no harm to go a little further, sir," said the cheerful David Postler, a tall, rosy-cheeked young man.

"They're very nice people; and I'll see that you're none the worse at the year's end."

"Going security for 'em, eh?" said the grocer, shrugging his fat shoulders.

"Well, it's more than I would be willing to do."

"How's the father, Rachel?" David Postler asked, as he rolled the candles up in a piece of brown paper rather more carefully than he would have done for an ordinary customer.

"He's pretty well, I thank thee, David," shyly answered the pretty Quakeress.

"What did he finally conclude to do about that offer of Carson's to-day?"

"What offer?" Rachel looked up in surprise.

"Hasn't he told you? Carson, the real estate agent, was around to see him, and offered him nine thousand dollars cash down for that old house that you live in."

Rachel took up her packet of candles in a confused way as a new customer advanced to the counter and, followed by a little lad bearing the pail of coals, left the store.

"Father," she cried, as she hurried into the house, and lighting one of the candles, sent the errand boy back with his empty pail, "what is that about an offer of nine thousand dollars for this house? Did thee refuse it?"

"Yes, Rachel," admitted Friend Seba. "But I tell thee, daughter, why I would not sell the place to Lyman Carson. He wants it to establish a headquarters for a National Lottery. It is conveniently close to the corner, and they need a building such as this one could be altered into."

"But if we sell it, father, it is nothing to us what use is made of it afterward," pleaded Rachel. "We are not the people who open the lottery. Lotteries are—well, not quite right, perhaps if they don't buy our house, they will buy some one else's. And we need the money so much. We are so poor, father."

"Rachel! My little girl!"

Rachel had buried her face in her hands. The next instant she flung both her arms around her father's neck with a burst of tears.

"I know it! I know it!" she sobbed.

"Thee is right, father; thee is always right. It would have been a wicked and sinful thing to do. It is not for us, for a mere matter of gain, to fight against the standard of the Lord in ever so trifling a matter. Thee knows best, father. We will starve before we will barter away our souls."

Seba Simmons said not a word. He merely sat quite still, and stroked the shining bronze bands of her hair with a loving hand; and when at last she was silent he gently repeated the Scripture words:

"I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

"And now, father," said Rachel, cheerfully, "I will toast thee a bit of bread when the fire burns up bright, and make a cup of tea. And if thee has any more copying from the law office to do, I will help thee with it, for the evenings are getting so nice and long now."

"Such fools!" growled Lyman Carson, the real estate agent. "The whole rattle-drap of a place ain't worth five thousand dollars if it wasn't so handy to the corner! And here Old Father Simmons refuses nine! Point refuses it!"

"Make it ten," shrewdly suggested the vulture-faced man, who, in the interest of the National Lottery Company, was endeavoring to drive the bargain. "Or even eleven. Our folks are not disposed to skimp, if everything can be made suitable."

"'Twouldn't be of any use," said Carson.

"The old fool has got what he calls Scruples. Hang scruples say I. Here he is, over head and ears in debt, without any visible means of livelihood except a daughter who works in a worsted store—house all mortgaged, and everything out of repair—one would think he'd jump at the chance!"

"Well," contemptuously uttered the vulture-faced man, "he must be a flat!"

"The fools ain't all dead yet," said Carson, angrily, expectorating into a tin spittoon which occupied the post of honor in the office. "Come, if you've got to look elsewhere, there's no harm in considering that shop on Carment street."

The next night Rachael Simmons came home an hour earlier than usual.

"I've got news for thee, father," she said, sitting down beside his chair and passing her arm fondly around her neck.

"Mr. Waldon has cut down expenses and discharged nine of the hands, and I am one of the nine!"

"Thee will have more time to help me with the copying," said Friend Seba, smiling faintly.

"But father—"

"Thee has not told me all, daughter," said the old man sharply. "Thee has kept something back. I can tell it in the tones of thy voice."

Rachel laughed a little tremulously.

"Thee is right, father," said she. "David Postley has asked me to be his wife."

"I thought," said the old man, "that David was to be married to his employer's daughter."

"No, father," said Rachel. "Eliza Pennifer would have liked it, I think; but David does not care for Eliza Pennifer. He says—he says, father, that he likes me."

Old Seba Simmons caressed his daughter's hand.

"And yet," said he, "Friend Pennifer is rich, and can give his daughter a fortune, and we are poor folk. But, all the same, Rachel, I think our young friend David has done well! A good daughter, they say, will make a good wife!"

"He says," whispered Rachel, "that he will come here to live, if thee does not object to his opening a flour and feed store on the ground floor. He has some little capital saved up, and—"

"He will be as a son to me, daughter," said Simmons. "Thee may tell him so!"

Every one in the neighborhood marvelled that David Postley could prefer Rachel Simmons to Eliza Pennifer, who had such fine black eyes of her own, and wore a diamond ring to match, on her plump forefinger, besides owning a piano, and having been educated at boarding-school! But the little ripple of public opinion had hardly subsided, and the blue and gilt painting of the sign "D. Postley, Flour and Feed," was yet new, when a fresh topic of conversation arose in the neighborhood.

"Nobody's posed the Elevated Railway's travel was comin' that was," spluttered Lyman Carson, "or we'd have bought out the old Quaker at twenty thousand dollars, and made him believe we was going to open a mission-school on the premises! Gracious! what a change it would've been!"

"He's sold it to the company for ten thousand," grumbled his partner.

"That's his own fault. He could have got three times the money," snarled Carson. "But there ain't no understandin' these Quakers."

At about the same time little Rachel, with her face all aghast, was confiding her good luck to a friendly neighbor's ear.

"We have bought a farm," said she.

"Father has always sighed for a country life. He was born and bred, thee knows, on a Pennsylvania farm. And there is a store on the place where David can make money enough to render us independent of bad weather and poor crops. And we are so happy!"

"And it is better, is it not, daughter Rachel," said old Seba, "than to imperil our souls and the souls of others by lending ourselves to the devices of Satan in regard to that lottery business, even though it came to us vailed in a fair outside show. The Lord has taken care of us. I knew he would. Thee must remember, Rachel, all thy life how useful it is that we poor mortals should have faith as a grain of mustard seed."

"Your father is right, Rachel," said David, earnestly.

"Father is always right," said Rachel.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural quiet sleep by relieving the child from pain; and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, relieves wind, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhoea, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, and take no other kind. [April 1 '88]

THE Turnip crop of the Island is a very important one. Turnips require good soil and careful cultivation. Never sow poor seed because it is cheap. We recommend our readers to buy their Turnip Seed from George Carter & Co., Try their Turnip Fertilizer too; it is highly recommended. See advt.

TO THE DEAF.—A person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy will send a description of it FREE to any person who applies to NICHOLSON, 39 St. John Street, Montreal. 4m—m14
