WE AND OUR NEIGHBORS

Welcome Back, Beloved Old Folks—Great Great Greats

Ruhamah S. Frank

Children and old people have always understood one another. Once, grandparents were a child's best friend. But now, grandparents are often youngish men and women with busy lives and interests of their own. For full undivided attention small children must look to their great-grandparents!

AT THE BEACH
A pretty three year old at the beach clings to her great-grandmother. Who can blame her? Great grandmother is a dainty little lady, active enough to keep pace with the little girl and with a ready laugh — and what is more, an unfailing readiness to listen to her and play with her. (Grandmother is in the prime of life with only odd moments to devote to her.)

For one great-grandfather and one small lad it has been a wonderful summer at the beach. The old man has been building a outdoor grill in front of his cottage, and the five year old boy has been a great help — undoubtedly — fetching and holding tools etc. It has been charming to watch the two talking and working together.

AT THE PUBLIC SQUARE
In one of the public squares (all too few) in town, I watched a child about two years of age, making his way from his mother to an old man (really old) sitting along on a bench. The child was dragging behind him a wagon, its back wheels mended with twine that no longer held. The child set the wagon on the old man's knee and pointed to the wheels. The man carefully examined the wagon, cut away the old string and fixed the wagon with string he took from his pocket. This was evidently a familiar job for the old man. The child smiled and pulled the wagon back and forth near his friend's bench. Then dragging it after him, he went to his mother. She had been watching and called out a friendly "thank you" to the old man who smiled and nodded.

WASHINGTON SQUARE
I have sat for hours in Washington Square, N.Y. City, watching the friendly interchanges between old people and very young people. I have been especially intrigued by the relationship between the old men and the children. There is a portion of Washington Square set aside as a playground for the children, and there I have seen the same old men sitting, instead of in the section with other adults. I have seen small girls bring them their dolls to mend; small boys with their broken wagons and boats.

Perhaps these old men once lived on farms and remember beloved grandparents and great grandparents. Their destiny has not been the warm and secure chimney corner with children to tend and play with — the park bench near the small ones is the best they can do.

WILL SWING BACK
I do believe that the pendulum will swing back. Families are getting larger; more and more mothers are leaving small children to work outside the home. What baby sitters can compare with loving grandparents? Old age pensions can help toward the rent of an extra room — Welcome Back, beloved old folks!

ELLEN'S DIARY

Babe In His Carriage Loves The Outdoors

We did wish hard there beside our long-haired witching black cat last evening on the old stone doorstep of this house, as we waited a sound of the workers returning from Rob's and the haying, and incidentally watched as the days go to rest.

We wished that the millpond below our front meadow which James has known forever, and we through our wedded years and before, was up again to a head. That the area of shallow, dry now and growing a crop of sedge and water-weed to the stream's edge was afloat and the spillway a bit damaged in a winter freshet was back to former service again.

"I wonder what the weather'll be like through the day for the haying", James said this morning stopping a moment after an old habit before the gable window to the south. "It used to be that I could pretty well forecast it by the millpond — and always tell the way of the wind. How I miss that pond!" he sighed.

We too miss it — miss its lovely mirrorings of mill and cloud and hillsides, and the Public bridge as now decked out in a fresh coat of paint.

And the day remained fine for the farmers, indeed it was an ideal one to make and save loads of hay to Rob's barn. And to bring the endeavour within sight now of its close.

"Another fine day or two" they brought in the word this evening, "and the haying will be over for the year."

At Alderlea, the babe in the carriage loved the outdoors with its sun and warmth. The fool too in the orchard, as Mack said "More like a horse now" lying long moments stretched in sleep, basked in its rays. The new litter down from the baker's count to the dozen we know, was cuddled in a pink heap in a sunny corner of the pen. How quiet it was about, with the school-children away and the farmers taken up with the affairs of Rob's haying.

"And we'll be going to" we overheard Mrs. Blackbird say watching a number of neat song sparrows fly in a flock along the near meadow and lane.

"And when, my Love?" he queried.

"After a bit" she said. "When we see the tiny birds congrega-
