THE TRIUMPH OF TRUTH.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

In the meantime Ulric's only thought was to reach quickly the uppermost floor. He could just distinguish through the smoke and fire the staircase which led to it.

He covered his face with his hands, and sprang boldly forwards. With three leaps he cleared the staircase, and stood breathless at the top, while behind him the already consumed staircase fell to pieces.

Ulric endeavoured to check the effusion of the grateful woman's thanks, and talked with the boy, whom he praised for having clung to his neck so fast, and for not leaving him frightened when he was swinging on the slender rope between heaven and earth.

Ulric accompanied them, and took the child in his arms, and carried him to his grandfather's house, where they were all received with great demonstrations of joy.

CHAPTER III. Everybody had forgotten the brave boy Ulric, except the grateful mother and the gentleman in the brown coat, who had offered a hundred Louis d'ors for the rescue of the child.
