ELLEN'S DIARY

What Is A Saint? A Child Has The Answer

And so they come to us — gifts from Heaven, the rose-garlanded July days; And so, now without regret we tell them off in our lives, loved much, we give them away. Much enchantment of month and season is on every hand — the lushness of the summer, the daisied beds so winsome where nestling the grasses one may find the ariet sweets of wild strawberries blowing. How fragrant now the ver! And pretty for us at Aliea, along the dam, the tangle wild vetch which in some way caught its shades we could say from those of the purpling adonis that rest there so soft in the first dusk. Now too there, and along the beam, in its delicate creamy loveliness blooms the Queen Anne's lace — the Wild Parsley or Queen Anne's Pocket Handkerchief as we know it. For fairy uses though it is said. The fairies found it was no use or hankies, it is true; its pattern is too large for them, so they made it do for bedspreads and for tablecloths. "Id lacy curtains too." Yes, for tablecloths of gossamer web upon which are scattered the luscious lunches for Queen Mab of her train, just at the stroke of eleven. In the breathless silver of onlight, or in the dim of the arshine when the fireflies must be think "hold light" for them with their sparkling lantern. We them earlier, there below the out meadow, lights gleaming, an vanishing momentarily, to be esently again bright, intriguing peacocks" of the night. This continues to be a busy time these farms, though it seems thout the insistence of the croping. It is after a manner so leirely that today we heard James eak of it to a visitor. "It doesn't seem that we have uch to show for our work these ys", he said. "Oh there's plenty keep us employed — fencing and tuffing and the like, but other mmmers we always had some bulling or repairing to do along with e farming. I guess", he smiled,

"we're kind of missing that this year." And the days pass pleasantly, placid as the summer stream that bears off no dropped leaf yet, but only the reflections of summer sky and tree and field away. And we, often thoughtlessly, unwittingly, mar and blur the hours we spend, who would be a saint by doing lovely things for Thee. "In A Saint" Mary, Edgar writes. "A little child one summer morn Within a chancel gazed At a lovely stained glass window, Through which the sunlight blazed. Enshrined in glowing colours A gentle figure smiled From out the lofty casement Upon the wondering child. "What is a saint? she whispered. It must be someone who Is like a stained-glass window And lets the sun shine through!" Until Monday — —Diary — Goodnight. . . .

SUMMER DANCE DRESS

VARIOUS fabrics, brought to either with a knowing hand, are used to make some of the season's restiest dresses. Cecil Chapman applies her know-how to a divine dance dress for sweet summer evenings. She combines sheer lace cotton with frosty white lace, combining alternate rows of the Alencon lace and cotton tucks. The flaring skirt is achieved by wide gorges which bell out at the hem.
