CHAPTER XVII

He had spoken with a confidence he was far from feeling, for he was by no means sure that they would obey him in their present excited state; but to his vast relief they started to troop off the plateau immediately. Friendly hands had already cut Looaki loose and in another couple of minutes the open space was clear of all save the two white men, M'fani, and the scared bewildered Samoans.

As he stepped down from his chair, sweating with relief, Thurlow found himself face to face with the trader. The latter had recovered something of his composure now, but the look in his eyes plainly indicated the rage and chagrin he was feeling.

"So that's the line you're taking, is it?" he said slowly. "You've turned down my offer and you think you're going to cut me out and run this show on 'love your brother' principles! All right — now we know where we are! Don't think I'm going to take this lying down though! I'm not finished yet — not by any means. But I'll see that you are before we're through!"

He turned on his heel without another word and strode off towards his bungalow, and the Samoans who had been gathered in a knot watching them began to make their way towards their own fale, muttering among themselves as they went.

The disappointed Tefoora, however, lingered behind and eyed Thurlow with insolent scorn. "Plenty fine number one master, you!" he growled as the latter caught his eye. "Us fellas no savvy you!" And he spat on the ground to emphasize his disapproval.

The other men had paused and were looking back and at this they set up a nervous laugh. Thurlow stepped forward three paces, which brought him within a foot of the Samoans.

"You no savvy me?" he repeated quietly, looking into the man's eyes which were on a level with his own.

Tefoora, conscious that his fellows were watching him, stared back as insolently as ever.

"No savvy damfool white man!" he announced defiantly.

Thurlow hit him twice — a sudden, half-arm jab to the body with his left, and then, as he doubled up, he stepped back a pace and swung in a right hook to the jaw that connected with a crack like a pistol shot and sent the man sprawling over sideways in a crumpled heap.

Then he spun round to face the others who were gaping helplessly at the suddenness of the onslaught. "Anyone else no savvy me?" he demanded grimly.

They remained staring at him without saying a word, and after a moment he nodded. "Right," he said. "Then some of you had better help Tefoora out of it." Two of the men detached them-

An excellent scholar, he was also a member of the hockey and football teams and for the last year was president of the Glee Club.

He stared after her, puzzled by her odd manner, and then made his way slowly to the darkened Residency.

ing at him with a strange intensity. "Well, that's that!" he said. And then, looking at the object in her hand: "Here, give me that thing!"

She handed it to him without a word, and he flung it across into the fire, which was already collapsing upon itself.

"We shan't want anything like that in the future!" he said shortly. "Arafui is going to have a fresh start from to-night. When your chief comes, we'll hope to show him a better island and a happier people. M'fani!"

Before he could make any reply, she had turned and was running lightly towards the trader's bungalow.

He returned after her, puzzled by her odd manner, and then made his way slowly to the darkened Residency.
