Cover Illustration:

There is hardly a spot of land on the Island where one does not encounter one to a great many adult female mosquitos attempting to get the meals of blood used before producing their eggs. These prolific insects form an important part of the food web of fresh water and salt water marshes, woodlands, and wet depressions. Dragonflies, small fish, and birds feed on large numbers of their larvae and adults. This illustration shows the egg mass on the left with a adult emerging on the upper right.
