MARY HAWORTH

She's His Boss At Work, Is Domineering At Home

Dear Mary Haworth: Sally and I married four years ago, when just out of college, and went to work for an interior decorating firm in the field in which we had specialized. Last year our section boss retired and Sally got the job. Her pay went up and she became a junior executive. I was little more than a clerk and she was my boss.

On the job she is very efficient, impartial and fair. The problem is that her promotion she has become demanding, domineering and superior at home. She considers housework beneath her and I am cooking, scrubbing, washing, ironing, shopping, taking care of her clothes and so on, while she sits in her easy chair, reading the school and such. I never have time for study.

She is blithely and flatteringly says I am better at housework than she is. I am not doing well and she is going to have to move me down to a lesser job soon. She said I am not doing well and she is going to have to move me down to a lesser job soon. She said I am not doing well and she is going to have to move me down to a lesser job soon.

Now have you got the message? Turn over a new leaf. Take care of yourself as I do. Take care of yourself as I do. Take care of yourself as I do. Take care of yourself as I do.
