

Hold Inquest
In Death Of French Explorer

WELLINGTON, N.Z. (Reuters) A coroner decided Tuesday that Eric de Bisschop, veteran French explorer, was killed when he and four other men tried to ride their waterlogged raft across a Pacific island reef to safety.

Meanwhile, the French mine-sweeper Lotus has gone to Raka-hanga in the Cook Islands where de Bisschop died, 1,100 miles northeast of New Zealand, to take his body and four survivors to Tahiti, 800 miles away.

The story of how the bamboo raft Tahiti Nui II was blown off course, battered by storms at sea and then wrecked when its crew tried to "shoot" the reef at Raka-hanga last Sunday was told by Alain Brun, de Bisschop's second-in-command.

He said the raft was partly under water. The crew was weak from hunger and thirst, when de Bisschop, with the crew's consent, decided to try to make for the beach.

INJURIES ARE FATAL

When the raft broke up on the reef de Bisschop was so badly injured that he later died, Brun said.

The raft left Chile Feb. 15. Two months out, a passenger ship was sighted and hailed and told that everything was going well.

After that, Brun said, storms struck the raft, blowing it north of its plotted course. It became waterlogged and unsafe in rough seas.
