FAITHFUL

By MARGARET GORMAN NICHOLS

CHAPTER III

Louis lifted his brows. "She's faithful, too faithful ,to the boy you saw out there. She'll never admit it but she isn't in love with him. Love has become pity. A lot of women don't know the difference. Iris is too fine to spend her life giving her affection to people who need her and for whom she feels sorry. She ought to have some one to lean upon, some one to make her happy. If you can't do that, don't see her again."

"Then I shall see her again," said Mark. "Her ideas are all distored. Apparently she's wasting herself on people who had no idea of her worth." He smiled at Louis. "Take off the white coat, old man, an drop the professional air. We're going out to drink a toast to Iris."

"And what will the toast be?"

Mark grimmed. "I'm going to marry her. And it's not a pleasont thought, is it, that I've got to make her untrue to hereself before I do."

"That," said Dr. Tracy grimly, "is a big order, my boy. It isn't just Iris with whom you're involved but several parasites who live on her."

The small restaurant was crowded and the voices of many people mingled with the feverish music. Curitly Joel gave the order to the waiter and then, turning to Iris, set cold, accusing blue eyes upon her.

"I've done nothing," she said. In her voice was a plea to make these forbidden moments pleasant. "Don't look at me as if I've done something terrible. Joel, don't be unreasonable."

"You've been out with him, haven't you? I saw the way he looked at you. And you call me possessive! He looked at you as if . . . . . "

"Please don't talk so loud." She felt the blood surging to the surface of her face as a man at the next table turned his eyes from his evening paper to them. "This is not the place . . . . . "

"What do I care if people hear us?" he cried. "You don't know what it means to play the game fair? I guess," he scoffed, "your mother made you do it. That's a good excuse! You're engaged to me!"

"But I'm not married to you," said Iris. "I have played the game, as you call it, fairly. We've been over this so many times before. Don't you ever think I want to be happy when I'm with you? We never go anywhere that we don't argue about the same thing. In movies, in restaurants, on street cars. For a year I've never left you that you weren't angry. You don't trust me, Joel."

"I don't trust the men you go with. Pardon," he smiled sarcastically, "the men your mother makes you go out with. Do you think that a man like Christian has any serious intentions with you? When he marries, it will be to a woman of his own class."

"There are exceptions," she answered, putting her hand over his. "We're both class prejudiced, Joel. We hate them because they're rich and we're poor. They were born rich. We weren't. We can't hate them for their birthright."

"I haven't been out with another girl since I met you. You can't say you haven't been out with other men. I won't lose you, Iris, without a fight."

"But I've told you every time—told you everything."

"You haven't told me about Christian."

"I was at his apartment last night and . . . . . "

"His apartment!" he shouted as the waiter put their food before them.

People turned and stared at the angry boy and the humiliated girl. Iris felt her strength desert her and tears start in her eyes at the sea of strange faces, some amused at the scene, others concerned. With shaking hands she picked up her purse and gloves and it seemed an eternity before she reached the door. Outside she stopped a moment in bewilderment and then hurried down the street, feeling that even people on the street knew of the ghastly scene from which she had fled.

On the corner Joel caught up with her. Under the pale glow of the street lamp she turned to him.

"You have hurt me before with your temper and jealousy but you've humiliated me before a room of people; Have you no pride, Joel? Aren't you aware of anything but your selfish desires? Yes, I went to Mark's apartment last night. I was in an automobile accident and he took me there.. My hat covers the bruises on my forehead. But you wouldn't wait for an explanation! Oh, no! You had to come to your own ugly conclusions." She drew away from him. "Until you can respect me, don't try to see me again."

She turned abruptly and crossed the street and did not look back at him. For an hour she walked in dark unfrequented street, fighting for control over hurt and shame. The thoughts of going home to Selina's questions, Tommy's failure and Eve's lovely but often nerve wrecking voices practicing added to her misery. Iris thought, "It is springtime and I should be walking in it and loving it. But I can't even think of it for all the things that seem to be pressing together inside of me."

After a long ride in a crowded street car she opened the front door of the house in Walbrook. Eve was reading in the living room. Somewhere in the house Tommy was whistling. Selina came out of the kitchen untying her neat white apron.

"Iris, why didn't you let me know you weren't coming home to dinner?"

Dinner! Left on a restaurant table! But she was not hungry and in her confusion at finding Joel and Mark at the office she had forgotten to telephone.

"I'm sorry, Mother."

"It's all right, dear." She patted Iris's arm fondly. "Mr. Christian called just a few minutes ago. Iris, he is such a charming person. So cultured. He said to tell you that he'd call for you at the office tomorrow and take you to dinner. Now that," rejoined Selina, "is the kind of gentlemen I like to have interested in you."

Tommy came down the steps.

"Gue what, Iris? I have a job—in a gas station. Starting tomorrow. The pay isn't bad but the hours are awful."

Eve closed her book and said, "Mark Christian certainly is persistent, Iris. He didn't ask you to go. He just said he was taking you. You have no choice."

Wearily Iris pulled off her hat. "That's true. I have no choice."

It was Selina who insisted that Iris wear her new spring clothes to the office the next day. She put on the gray dress, gray slippers, gray coat with a band of fur, and a small gray silk turban.

When she arrived at the office, Louis said, "You look positively bridish, Iris. With a corsage of orchids you'd be properly attired for the wedding ceremony. Big date tonight?" He laughed and took her hand. "I was with Mark when he called last night. It was I who warned him not to mention the fair-haired boy who called for you."

Iris shrugged. "He's poor, Louis, and Mother has ambitions for me."

"I see. Ambitions for herself, you mean. Go out with Mark tonight and forget about the fair-haired lad who seems to think he owns you, about your ambitious mother, and the women who come here because they have nothing more to do than imagine themselves ill. And," he added, "forget about Annette, too."

"I wish I could."

"There's something at the bottom of her actions that puzzles me. It will come to light sooner or later. In the meantime don't worry."

Iris smiled. "To be branded a home-wrecker is one I can't forget."

WAR CHANGES TOURIST PLANS

PORT OF SPAIN, Trinidad—A total of 13,725 tourists, the largest number in the history of the island, passed through this colony during 1935, according to statistics released here. The increase of 3,000 over the previous record, established in 1934, was attributed to political developments in the Mediterranean, many steamships having changed their cruises to the West Indies and South America.

Wedding Of Lady Angela Scott

LONDON, April 28—The Duke and Duchess of Gloucetser attended the wedding of Lady Angela Montagu-Douglas-Scott to Lieut.-Commander Peter Dawnay.

The bride is the youngest daughter of the Duke of Buccleuch and of the Dowager Duchess of Buccleuch, and her bridegroom is the son of the late the Hon. Hugh Dawnay and of Lady Susan Dawnay.

St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, which was the scene of the ceremony, was crowded with guests. The Archbishop of Canterbury officiated, assisted by Canon G. Cooke and the Rev. L. N. de Bugh.

With the bridgeroom as his best man was Captain David Dawnay, his brother.

The Duke of Buccleuch arrived with his sister, and subseqeuntly gave her away. She looked radiant in her all white bridal toilette. Her gown of rich ivory satin was cut on simple lines with a draped neckline. Lovely old lace was lent by Lady Susan Dawnay for the wedding veil, which was held in place by a simple wreath of orange blossoms. The briday bouquet was composed entirely of white flowers.

Six little girls followed the bride, and to complete the procesison there were two grown-up maids, Lady Rachel Douglas-Home and Miss Jean Scott. The children were: Lady Caroline Scott, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch; Miss Renira Hawkins and Miss Diana Phipps, neices of the bride; the Hon. Elizabeth Cholmondley, daughter of Lord and Lady Delamere; and the Misses Blanche and Rachel Dawnay, neices of the bridegroom. They all wore pretty frocks in the same lovely satin as the bridal gown, the only color being their sashes of sky blue satin. On their heads were wreaths of pink flowers matching the bouquets of mixed pink flowers they carried.

After the ceremony the Dowager Duchess of Buccleuch held the reception at 2 Grosvenor Gardens. Among the many hundreds of wedding presents displayed were the blue and gold toilet set from the Queen, the two silver sugar sifters from the Duke and Duchess of York, the diamond wristlet watch from the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, the petit-point evening bag from the Princess Royal and the Earl of Harewood, and the jade ornament, the gift of the Duke of Kent.

Princess Alice, Countess of Athlone also attended the ceremony with the Earl of Athlone and her daughter Lady May Abel Smith.

STURGEON WOMEN'S INSTITUTE

The May meeting of the Sturgeon Women's Institute was held at the home of Mrs. Morris Daley on the evening of May 6th. Meeting opened by singing "It's a Good Time to Get Acquainted" followed by calling of roll which was answered by paying a nickle; minutes of previous meeting read and approved. There were eighteen members present and eight visitors, and five new members were gladly welcomed to the Institute roll, making a total of twenty nine members. Committees were then heard from and new ones appointed: Mrs. Hugh Collings and Miss Winnifred McGee school committee. Mrs. Richard Llewellyn and Mrs. Thos. Creed, sick committee. Questionnaires were filled in by Miss McGee. It was agreed that each member pay 10c the month of April for donation to Red Cross. Also a chair be bought for the teacher in the primary room.

Then the program was called for and Mrs. Hugh Collings gave a splendid reading titled "Our Institute." The rest of the evening was spent in conversation and music, furnished by the president, Mrs. Earl Llewellyn, after which a dainty lunch was served by the hostess assisted by Miss Gertie Lannigan and Mrs. James Jamieson.

The meeting closed by singing the National Anthem.

SEEKS MARKET FOR NEWFOUNDLAND WOOD

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld., May 13—(C. P.)—Newfoundland timber was generally admitted to be at least equal to Northern European wood in physical qualities, but the same care in production was not taken, Jack Turner, Chief Forestry Officer of the Department of Natural Resources, said in a report published following a study of United Kingdom markets.

Chief Forestry Officer said he talked with importers, dealers and users, operators of two coal mines, a paper mill, one newsprint mill, and a number of timber storage yards during his tour.

"Newfoundland wood is strong enough for pitprops and structural timbers and gives a high yield of good fibre for paper making. Our spruce and balsam are rated as good raw material.

"Unfortunately, the finished product—pitprops, pulpwood or wood wool stock—is often not good," the report stated.

While it was "almost unheard of" for a shipment of Finnish or Russian wood to be rejected, some wood was turned down in almost every Newfoundland shipment made to the British Isles.

NOW IS THE TIME TO STRETCH THEIR PELTS

You can increase pelt size and quality NOW, but not when the pelts are on the stretchers next Fall. Foxes are made or marred during the first few weeks after they are weaned. They are altogether too valuable to use for feeding experiments and great care should be taken to see that they are fed only a balanced and nutritious ration. START your pups on R-M STANDARD PUPPY MEAL—a ration tested and proven from experience—and watch them grow. Give your pups this foundation feed, they will grow larger pelts and denser fur.

R-M VITA-CRUMBLA "B" (Reg'd)

contains the necessary vitamins and minerals for bone development and vigorous growth. Setbacks during the developing period can never be fully overcome. VITA-CRUMBLA (Reg'd) contains cereals and an abundant supply of carbohydrates, it is rich in proteins, iron, phosphorous and vitamins A, B, D and G. VITA-CRUMBLA (Reg'd) is thoroughly cooked and it can be readily assimilated by the digestive organs.
