On the 15th inst. at North Pole, Vernon River, from the effect of a wound received on the head by the falling of one of the poles of a triangle, used in drawing a pump out of a well, on the premises of his brother Donald, who was also severely hurt, JOHN M'DONALD, aged 38 years, much respected and regretted by a large circle of friends and neighbours, leaving a disconsolate widow and five children to deplore their loss. He lived about 12 hours after being wounded.

(Communicated.)

A body, supposed to be that of an American fisherman, was discovered to be lying on the beach at New London, on Friday, the 14th inst., it was immediately taken charge of by James Campbell, Esq., and conveyed to a house, and as soon as a coffin could be prepared, he was interred in the nearest church-yard. But what his name was, or to what vessel he belonged, remains unknown. The flesh was entirely off his head and face, so that nothing remained but the bare skull, his hands were also off by the wrists. His dress consisted of a blue shirt, jacket, waistcoat and trousers, of blue pilot cloth, a suit of oil clothes and a pair of American made boots. There were no papers found, but on his right arm were two marks resembling a heart and a half-moon; he was about 6 feet high, and stout in proportion. He has indeed found a grave among strangers, but it may be a consolation to those who mourn lost friends, that every act of kindness and sympathy which humanity could suggest, or the most affectionate friend desire, were performed for his mortal remains.
