A MODERN PARRHASIUS

By FRANCIS LYNDE.

quipped to electrocute a man with your vitality. I'm sorry I had to give you an object lesson, but you see now what you have to fear if you don't do as I tell you."
"Ye're about the rummiest customer ever I struck," said the man, getting cautiously upon his feet. "Wot'er ye goin' to do with a cove?"
"That depends entirely upon your behavior. For reasons which you wouldn't understand it has become necessary for me to know personally a gentleman of your profession. If you will be tractable and quiet and tell me what I want to know, I propose to entertain you as my guest for a day or two, after which you may go your way without reference to your object in coming here tonight."
"And wot' I kick on all that?"
"You will be shocked first and turned over to the police afterward, but you will be reasonable, I'm sure. This house is simply a deathtrap for any one who doesn't know it. You couldn't get out of it alive in broad daylight without my help or a pair of wings. It's getting late. Which will you do?"

"Oh, I'll come off de perch, 'f course. I ain't no bloomin' bluffer w'en it comes to de show down."
"I thought you'd be sensible. Now give me your weapons, and we'll go up stairs."
But the burglar had no weapons, and what seemed still more singular, no tools. Leonard marveled greatly thereat, but his guest explained:
"I was just gettin' de lay 'f de land, d'ye see? No use bringin' de whole machine shop 'f der wasn't goin' to be no chance to use it."

"But do you usually go unarmed?"
"Course we does," replied the burglar, with fine irony. "Us coves ain't no bloody sluggers. Wot we wants is de swag. See?"
Leonard promptly made a note of the first fact in his diagnosis and sent Helen the fourth and last signal.
"Now, then, Mr.—"
"Bitts," said the burglar.
"Mr. Bitts, come with me, and we'll take a few notes tonight, if you don't mind."
Leonard led the way to his study and wheeled out an easy chair for the burglar. "Sit down and make yourself comfortable," he said. "Do you smoke?"
Mr. Bitts admitted the fact, and Leonard passed the cigar stand and settled himself at his writing table. Then and there began an inquest into criminal methods and motives the like of which no courtroom has ever witnessed, and through it all the burglar reclined lazily in the easy chair, smoking contentedly and talking as freely as any investigator, however curious, could wish.
For an hour Leonard's pen kept even pace with his queries, but after that the talk became less investigative on the part of the host and slightly more inquisitive on that of the guest.
As an unlettered craftsman of the guild felonious, knowing less than nothing of things literary, Bitts was naturally curious to acquaint himself somewhat with the doings of the strange world into which he had stumbled, and his ignorance was so naive that Leonard, enthusiastic to the lips on the subject of his calling, was at some pains to explain his work, its methods, its difficulties and its achievements.
