FOUL PLAY.

By Charles Reads.

CHAPTER VIII.

He said nothing, and when she looked around again, he was pale and trembling.
The revelation was so sudden.

"Pray be calm, sir," said she. "We need speak of this no more. But now, I think, you will not be surprised that I come to you for religious advice and consolation, short as our acquaintance is."

"I am in no condition to give them," said Hazel, in great agitation. "I can think of nothing but how to save you. May Heaven help me, and give me wisdom for that."

"This is idle," said Helen Rolleston, gently, but firmly. "I have had the best advice for months, and I get worse; and, Mr.
Hazel, I shall never be better. So aid me to bow to the will of Heaven. Sir, I do not repine at leaving the world; but it does grieve me to think how my departure will affect those whose happiness is very, very dear to me."

She then looked at the letter, blushed, and hesitated a moment; but ended by giving it to him whom she had applied to as her religious adviser.

"Oblige me by reading that. And, when you have, I think you will grant me a favor I wish to ask you. Poor fellow! so full of hopes that I am doomed to disap-point."

She rose to hide her emotion, and left Arthur Wardlaw's letter in the hands of him who loved her, if possible, more devotedly than Arthur Wardlaw did; and she walked the deck pensively, little dreaming how strange a thing she had done.

As for Hazel, he was in a situation poignant with agony; only the heavy blow that had just fallen had stunned and benumbed him. He felt a natural repugnance to read this letter. But she had given him no choice. He read it. In reading it he felt a mortal sickness come over him, but he persevered; he read it carefully to the end, and he was examining the signature keenly, when Miss Rolleston rejoined him, and taking the letter from him, placed it in her bosom before his eyes.

"He loves me, does he not?" said she,
wistfully.

Hazel looked half stupidly in her face for a moment, then, with a candor which was part of his character, replied, doggedly:
"Yes, the man who wrote that letter loves you."

"Then you can pity him, and I may venture to ask you the favor to—it will be a bitter grief and disappointment to him if you break it to him as gently as you can; will you say that his Helen—will you tell him what I have told you?"

"I decline."

This point-blank refusal surprised Helen Rolleston, all the more that it was uttered with a certain sullenness, and even asperity, she had never seen till then in this gentle clergyman.

It made her fear that she had done wrong in asking it; and she looked ashamed and distressed.

However, the explanation soon followed.
"My business," said he, "is to prolong your precious life; and making up your mind to die is not the way. You shall have no encouragement in such weakness from me. Pray let me be your physician."

"Thank you," said Helen, coldly; "I have my own physician."

"No doubt; but he shows me his incapacity, by allowing you to live on pastry and sweets—things that are utter poison to you.
Disease of the lungs is curable, but not by drugs and unwholesome food."
