FUR AND FABRIC

This season the fashions have taken great inspiration from the styles that were the vogue during the "Roaring Twenties." In some cases we have felt that the bag look was one which was to be declined. But in many other bracket designers have given a modern twist to these flapper-day models and they've turned out looking charming as well as chic.

One of the most outstanding of these innovations is the coat with fur trim, which has been seen for many a season. We have always thought that a touch of fur does great things for its wearer and so we welcome a coat such as this one. It is a wool wrap-around with slit hip pockets, cuffed sleeves and a beautiful and luxurious blue fox collar.

Palaces And Castles Are Historic Landmarks

For one brief moment in its history England tried the experiment of abolishing the Crown, only to restore it again with an impatient sigh of heartfelt relief some ten years later. Cromwell's Commonwealth (1649-60) was doomed to failure from the outset, for deep in the heart of every ordinary Briton is the conviction that kingship should be an office unattainable to ambition and to all but the legally constituted heir.

This veneration for the Crown by the people has resulted in the survival throughout the centuries of many buildings, customs and ceremonies associated with the Crown, and thus it is that not a few Royal Palaces, though some of them are no longer residences of the Sovereign, remain to this day in an excellent state of preservation.

Not finnaturally most of the Royal Palaces are centred in or around London, and of these the Tower of London is by far the most ancient and historic. It has in its long history served both as a palace and as a prison, and today it houses the Crown Jewels, the richest collection of jewels in the world. On Tower Green were executed two wives of Henry VIII, Anne Boleyn and Catherine Howard, and the path etic Lady Jane Grey, besides several others who had risked the enmity of the Crown.

Buckingham Palace is the principal residence of Her Majesty the Queen, and is not open to the public. Its splendid apartments, which contain a priceless collection of paintings, are the scene of many of the great Court ceremonies and receptions. On occasions of national rejoicing it is the habit of Londoners to assemble in front of the Palace and make the welkin ring when the Queen appears on the central balcony, as she did after her Coronation on June 2nd, 1953.

Hampton Court Palace and St. James's Palace are two mellowred-brick buildings of the time of Henry VIII. Hampton Court, which contains a fine collection of pictures, is open to the public, and its walled gardens in spring and summer are magnificent. Extensive additions were made to this great Thames-side Palace by Sir Christopher Wren, so that today it presents a curious mingling of the turrets and mullastly classic architecure of he lions of Tudor days with the Renaissance.

St. James's Palace, the battlemented clock tower of which crowns the vista down St. James's Street, is the official address of the Court and is not open to the public. It was in this palace, in 1649, that Charles I spent his last night before being executed in front of Whitehall Palace, of which all that remains is the banqueting hall with its beautiful ceiling paned by Rubens. This is now the United Ser vice Museum.

The state apartments of Kensington Palace, which stands in Kensington Gardens, are open to the public from Spring to Autumn. Part of the palace is occupied by the London Museum. Queen Victoria was born at Kensington Palace in 1819.

Largest of London's royal palaces is the Palace of Westminster, unofficially and more usually known as the Houses of Parliament. This great building is the scene of the annual State Opening of Parliament by the Queen, and it is open to visitors on Saturdays.

Windsor Castle, situated on its hill overlooking the River Thames, has been the home of the Sovereign for over eight hundred years. The State Apartments, which contain many magnificent pictures, are open to the public when the Court is not in residence. St. George's Chapel, the chapel of the Knights of the Garter, is a lovely example of Perpendicular architecture at-its finest.

There are two important Royal Palaces at Edinburgh. Edinburgh Castle, perched on a precipitous rock rising from the centre of the city, has played a notable part in British history, for it was here that James I, the first king of Great Britain, was born. The Scottish War Memorial, which forms part of the castle, is probably the most beautiful war memorial ever to have been erected.

The Palace of Holyroodhouse is the official residence of the Queen when in Edinburgh. It is open to the public in the absence of the Court, and visitors are shown the room where Rizzio was stabbed to death while clinging to the skirts of Mary Queen of Scots. It was in this palace that the romantic Bonnie Prince Charlie made one of the delays that proved fatal to his cause and the Jacobite hopes.

Balmoral Castle, situated amid the mountains of Aberdeenshire, and Sandringham, near the coast of Norfolk, are favourite country homes of the Royal Family, but being private residences of the Queen they do not rank as palaces.

MARY HAWORTH

Alcohol Won't Benefit Anyone

Dear Mary Haworth: In answer to the wife who asks if social drinking is risky, possibly leading to addiction, your comments of September 25 suggest that you are reluctant to tell people to abstain entirely from alcoholic beverages. Why?

Alcohol cannot benefit one physically. If one is weak emotionally, he will not gain strength of character by drinking. And one must be weak indeed if he (she) drinks simply to follow the crowd. The urge to be-of-the-same - pattern is understandable in a 15-yearold, but not appropriate to an adult.

If one drinks because of fear of losing friendship or associations otherwise desirable, there is no real basis for such fear. I can testify to that from personal experience.

From 1917, when I entered the Army at age 26, I have refrained from drinking — originally because general orders forbade it. ARBITER OF IT:TAKE

Since discharge in 1919 I have been active in my profession, which requires dealing with persons from all strata of society. Also I have been active in several fraternal organizations — at last two of which, I regret, have earned reputations for drinking. And I have attended innumerable conventions, parties, etc., where the men, and in recent years the women, I am sorry to say, drank some getting drunk.

Nevertheless, I have never been embarrassed or snubbed or insulted because of my invariable "NO thanks; I don't use it," to all invitations to drink. There's no need to make any excuse or speech about it. A person has a right, that must be recognized, to decide that he will put into his stomach and what he will keep out—be it alcohol, shrimp, asparagus or porterhouse steak.

R. J.

RIGHT TO CHOOSE

Dear R.J.: In effect you are asking why I don't preach against the use of alcoholic beverages, when the subject of drinking is introduced. Well, I think that you yourself have supplied the sensible answer, in your concluding statement, to wit:

"A person has a right that must be recognized, to decide what he will put into his stomach and what he will keep out-foe it alcohol, shrimp, asparagus or porterhouse steak".

It was in recognition of this right (reasonably excreised) that the 18th Amendment was repealed, thus putting an end to the so-called noble experiment of trying to stamp out destructive drinking by legal force.

The waste of life, health, money and happiness caused by excessive and addictive drinking is a tragedy of mankind that education may eradicate, in time. But it probably won't be soon However, great strides have been made in this century towards understanding and thereby learning to control a formerly benighted drive towards alcoholic self-destruction.

TALKS TURKEY

Into my remarks of September 25, I interjected a bit of education, I hoped, by calling attention to James Lamb Free's book Just One More (Coward-McCann publishers) in which the author talks turkey to the reader about Charlie, a composite picture of the average problem drinker "who might be your husband, father, brother, sweetheart or even you." You."

He dedicates his book "To all the Charlies, my brothers . . . with affection and with hope that they may receive understanding and help like Julie gave me — which suggests that Mr. Free is speaking from the heart of personal experience, in laying bare what makes the drinker drink. And in telling how the problem may be conquered, once the drinker's mind is made up.

He also teaches the bedrock truth that nobody—but nobody—can help the drinker stay dry until the drinker himself has decided absolutely that he really wants to stop bending his elbow.

FASHIONABLE FOOTSTEPS

These handsome shoes are ideal to wear with the new fall suits, dresses and coats and they add an air of distinction to each and every one of these costumes.

Dark gray suede is used for the ones shown which are tipped and heeled with black calf. The calf is perforated to form a decoration on the upper toes, around the collars, and at the kith from which is laced with leather. The same style may be had in taupe suede combined with brown calf.

HOUSEHOLD HINT

Don't shake your dust mop out the window, from the back porch or any place where the dust will blow around. Tie a big bag around the mop head and shake vigorously; then throw the bag and dust away in the incinerator.
