Murder Is Forgetful
 By WILLIAM BOGART
 Steve, the guard, stood partly supported by the front fender of the station wagon. "What was wrong with the dog?" He dropped the cigarette butt and carefully ground it beneath his toe. He spoke as though he'd been watching for some time.
 "How long have you been standing here?" Johnny asked.
 "Five minutes, maybe."
 "You didn't hear anything?"
 The solidly-built fellow eyed Johnny. "Hear what?"
 "A little while ago. Something frightened Irene Smith. She was in her bedroom. I think she saw someone prowling around the balcony porch."
 "She tell you that?"
 "No," said Johnny, "she didn't tell us anything. She fainted. And when she came to, Kay says she was too upset to explain what scared her."
 "Well," said Steve, "nobody saw nothing!" He sounded belligerent. "I been near the house all the time. Nobody's snooping around here without me knowing it!"
 Johnny decided not to make an issue out of it. So he didn't say anything about actually seeing a figure moving in the thick shadows of the balcony. He was curious about one thing, however.
 "How do three of you fellows manage to cover this whole estate?"
 "One could do it," said the guard. He patted the holster at his hip. "Just let people know you're packing a rod, and not tell them where you're gonna be at any one time, and they ain't gonna take no chances!"
 "Everyone around this section knows the estate is guarded?"
 "You're damned right! That's why I say I could handle the job alone. But if the Smiths want to pay for three of us, that's their headache. Let some little thing happen, and these rich bugs get jittery. You ask me, they're wasting their money."
 The way the fellow looked at him, Johnny decided that he, himself, was classed among the non-essentials. Too, Steve was probably figuring his own salary in comparison with Johnny's. Or perhaps he just didn't like private investigators.

 "Nick!" Nancy's voice was hor-hor-stricken. "You speak as though you'd almost wish it would happen!"
 "All right, dammit!" Walker's voice was heavy with anger. "I did... lots of times!"
 Johnny Saxon heard the woman's sharp gasp. "Nick Walker, you don't know what you're saying!"

 is equally true that a college must not accept without careful scrutiny and thought every will of the wisp idea that comes along just because it is, for the moment, fashionable. "Modern" or "progressive" Old values and new ideas must be combined and I can say with much conviction, that this is one of the most difficult tasks of college administrators.
 "Educational ideas have been changing very rapidly lately and there are many conflicting tendencies. Some extremely serious weaknesses are evident and new processes are being devised to meet them. Prince of Wales, like any other college, must always be sensitive to its own weaknesses, and seek to improve its own facilities, and, if it is to serve its students and its community, it must share in wider educational movements."
Educational Problems
 "It is customary for Principals to make at Convocation a few comments on current educational problems, for reports on operations should also include some observations on educational difficulties which bear careful public consideration or two of them here. They relate to an important change which is taking place everywhere today and which is arousing much public interest—the raising of standards in both the so called academic and practical fields to increase (not decrease) the number of students qualified for various careers.
 "Just a few years ago the lowering of standards was fashionable; now a reaction has set in. High schools are adding a year, universities are raising their requirements, professional schools in medicine, law, and engineering are increasing the length of their courses and employers are becoming more demanding.
 "The coming expansion in the fields of knowledge is often considered to be the main reason for this change. There the other, more important reasons, based not on the amount of knowledge, but on the ability to seek it, not on the affairs of life but on the ability to face it.
 "Two serious problems which are now causing the raising of standards are superficiality and what may be called the "social service" theory of education.
 "Unfortunately there is a tendency, not universal I must emphasize, to spread instruction over so wide an area that superficial smattering is substituted for thought and understanding. All too frequently school and college students are encouraged to flit like butterflies from subject to subject and from grade to grade without taking in enough of one thing to argue their powers of thought and judgment. Fundamental subjects are often displaced by almost incredible rubbish and the situation has sometimes become so bad as to cause a violent reaction.
Thoroughness Emphasized
 "This is too big a subject to be discussed in detail here but I should like to offer some suggestions. Students at all levels should not only broaden their experience but also learn to do something thoroughly, for the advice of the Great Teacher of Christendom must never be forgotten: he that is faithful in a few things will be master of many. The same applies to activities outside studies.
 "Students should be careful not to become involved in too many outside activities. The "joker" who spreads his energies over too many clubs, groups, teams and activities will receive little of value from, and contribute next to nothing to, any one of them. In this era of societies, entertainments and activities of all varieties the earlier the student practices discrimination and self discipline in the extent and quality of his activities, the better he will be able to face, not only the work of the institutions of higher education, but also the demands of most forms of employment.
 "The cooperation of parents, teachers, and students in this regard is sorely needed. Extra-curricular activities are very important and desirable but they should not be too numerous.
 "The 'social service' theory of education in its extreme form postulates that education is something handed to students easily and painlessly accompanied by all sorts of enticing stimuli to arouse his 'interest'. Moreover, there are some who say that students should take only the subjects which "interest" them and drop the disciplines which "discourage" them. Education should not be a dreary, painful and uninteresting process with no choice as to subject matter, but neither is it easy, lively and entertaining.
 "No one ever receives an education, he works for it; society owes no one an education, it merely provides the opportunity of working for it, and the work, in every form of training, is often hard and uninteresting. We must never forget that work and the overcoming of obstacles are among the greatest character builders in school years and in practical life, and the boy or girl who is discouraged to by-pass every difficulty or uninteresting subject will not be prepared to face the many inevitable difficulties in careers, marriage and citizenship.
 "To be even more practical, is there any reputable employer who permits his employees to shirk the uninteresting or difficult features of their work, and, indeed, is there any worthwhile profession or employment which is free of hard work, boredom, and frustration? It should be unnecessary to ask such a question, but it is alarming to note how some parents, students, and educationalists think they are preparing young people for life by handing them everything on a silver platter decorated with frills of all kinds, and allowing them to do everything which might be "difficult" or "uninteresting" or "frustrating". Such an "education" bears little relationship to life have dispersed by the moonlight and rare charm of tonight, and with Denis A. McCarthy, have folks world-over join in the liting expressive lines of his "Song of Beauty."

 "Oh sing me a song of beauty! I'm tired of the stressful songs, I'm weary of all the preaching, the arguing right and wrong. I'm fain to forget the adter that under the leaf lies curled, And dream of the light and beauty that gladdens the grey old world.
 Oh sing of the emerald meadows that smile all day in the sun; The ripple and gleam of the rivers that on through the meadows run!
 Oh sing of the sighing branches of trees in the leafy woods, And the balm of the heart that is hidden afar in the solitudes!
 The birds — let them sing in your singing, and flash through the lines you write, The lark with his lilt in the morning; the nightingale charming the night,
 The butterfly over the flowers that hovers on painted wings!
 All these let them brighten and lighten the beautiful song you sing!
 And let there be faces of lovers, and let there be eyes that glow, And let there be tears of gladness instead of tears of woe, And let there be clinging kisses of lips for a time that part, And never a tristful shadow to darken a trustful heart!
 Ay, sing me a song of beauty — away with the songs of strife! Away with the spectre of sorrow that saddens the most of life! Though, under the leaf the adder of death and doom lies curled, Oh, sing for a space of the beauty that gladdens the grey old world."
 Until Monday — Diary — Good-night...

Standards Maintained
 "It is often said, by way of excuse for low standards, that education should always allow for variations in ability among students. This is true up to a point, but we find that success and failure in most cases does not result from the amount of brain power, but rather from the extent to which that amount (whether large or small) is used. We must never forget the fundamental axiom of education. Nor must we underestimate the fact that students thrive under rigorous but fair standards and that, contrary to an all too prevalent opinion, a high failure rate always results when standards are low and stimulus is lacking.
 "If schools and colleges cover up the failure rate by automatic passing they deceive the students and parents and merely postpone the inevitable reckoning until the student goes elsewhere or seeks employment. Automatic grading and the mixture of too much sentiment with education are among the chief reasons for the raising of standards and the objections of employers. There is much evidence, too, that the large number of students who drop out of school is one of the results of such weakness.
 "Until some drastic change is made respecting these weaknesses the raising of standards now so general everywhere will not cease, and the increasing failure rate in high school and university levels and in employment, so general in all Provinces, will not be reduced. I have great faith in young people and I am convinced that the great majority of them want quality in their educational facilities. In these times they deserve the best.
 "I wish to direct my final words to the graduating class. We look back with pleasure to our association with you over the years and we want you to take with you our faith in you and our sincerest good wishes for the future. We won't say good-bye to you, for we do not want you to feel that this is the end of our friendship. We look forward to watching your careers and to having you visit your Alma Mater whenever you can and retain your interest in her welfare.
 "My parting advice to you is not to consider what you have obtained here as automatically qualifying you as educated persons. No degree or diploma at any level will do that. The value of an academic preparation depends very largely on the use to which you put it. Some people, for example, make far more use of a matriculation training than others do of a graduate degree. The parable of the talents should indicate what to do with an education. Don't bury it, use it to the fullest possible extent and if you are not enough for what you want get more and use it to the top. Life like education is a challenge; we wish you every success in meeting it."

BURGESS BEDTIME

 tall, from whom he was trying to escape, had checked their flight after missing him, and now were turning to come back. Perhaps they chuckled when they saw him swaying back and forth on the tip of that branch. There was nothing for him to dodge around or behind. All they had to do was to fly right over and pick him off. Yes, sir, that is all they would have to do. It was going to be as easy as that.
 Poor Chatterer. If he let go and dropped, there was Reddy Fox down below. If he continued to hang on there either Redtail or Mrs. Redtail certainly would pick him right off that branch. It looked to all those watching as if somebody was going to have a Squirrel breakfast. It was simply a question of who that somebody would be.
 "I don't know which would be worse, Reddy's sharp teeth or Redtail's hooked bill," said Blacky the Crow.
 Redtail had checked himself and turned. His big wings began to beat fast as he started straight for Chatterer. "He hasn't a chance in the world," said Sammy Jay. Now Sammy and Chatterer had had many quarrels. They are very much alike in some ways. They are deeply love to make trouble for others. Both steal eggs when they have a chance. Both delight in spoiling the hunting of others. Each has stolen acorns and beechnuts from the other. You wouldn't exactly call them friends. But right now Sammy Jay forgot all his quarrels with Chatterer, forgot that they were not and never had been friends. Had there been any thing Sammy could have done at this moment to help Chatterer he would have done it.
 It was just at the moment that Redtail started toward Chatterer that it happened. Chatterer lost his grip! Yes, sir, Chatterer lost his grip! Down he fell, down, down. But he didn't fall as most folks would have fallen in his place, tumbling over and over, heels over head. No, sir, he didn't fall that way at all. He remained right side up. He spread his four legs out sideways as far as he could, thus making himself as flat as possible. That meant that he didn't fall as fast as he would have fallen otherwise.
 Down below Reddy Fox grinned so broadly that his mouth was wide open. It looked as if Chatterer might fall right into it. At the same time Redtail set his great curved claws to grab Chatterer right out of the air. Which one was going to get him for breakfast? Mrs. Chatterer closed her eyes. She didn't want to see the dreadful thing she was sure was about to happen. Blacky and all his Crow friends stopped cawing and flying about. For once they were too excited to use their tongues. There was not one looking on who was not sure that he was about to see the end of Chatterer. Strange to say they were sorry for Chatterer.
