Dr. Whitton's Address

pelled, as was his mellow Upper Canadian contemporary, Dr. Maurice Hutton, by the obsession of the Canadian people with the superficial values of that giddy decade.

PRINCIPLES OF DEMOCRACY

The principles of Democracy are simple in statement, complex in practice.

There is an innate value and right of each individual being to the freedom of his own life and soul, which carries with it the responsibility of self-discipline.

Acceptance of this principle leads to a second — that there is, therefore, inherent in the people collectively by reason of their judgment as a whole, this same inalienable right to govern themselves, directly or by those to whom they choose to entrust such rule and whom they will hold accountable for the exercise of this power.

Democracy can thus be the best or the worst form of government man could devise since its goodness must depend upon the goodness of the individual men and women who create and direct it.

If Democracy is to be a good form of government then it must be built upon not only the belief but the practice that each one of us has his or her own special "virtue" or quality of gift to make to the life of the whole; that it is our duty by reason of our powers to that fullness of our own powers to the community itself; and that in so doing we shall find the highest health and happiness of the spirit (I suppose what the modern psychiatrist calls "sublimation").

GRECIAN PHILOSOPHERS

To a system of government, founded on such belief in the innate good, and self-nurture of that good by the people who form it, goodness itself, Plato taught, is as the sun to the system of visible things.

Hence comes Plato's insistence on the right and morality in the individual life, and their strengthening by education, the process by which a man or woman becomes all that he or she is capable of becoming. Wisdom comes of clear knowledge of the good; courage from following the good without fear; temperance from resisting what are known to be the baser appetites, and a sense of justice from developing judgment and balance in these different forces and duties.

But, steadily, while the practices and policy of the Christian Church upheld the theory of Divine Right, the permeation of Christian teaching daily denied such fallacy as had Christ Himself, of whose Evangel it was that the Spirit informing blind Bartimeus, or the beggar or the leper, the noble or the rich young man, the fisher, the sailmaker, or the Emperor, was the same, in inherent worth and dignity, because it was of God, the indwelling spirit in man.

The Christian teaching, carried westward, led to the practice of fellowship and charity, the raising and succour of the needy, and more and more widely, the freeing of the serfs, sometimes by grace, sometimes by purchase from the feudal lords.

THE CITY STATES

About the markets and trading centres grew the people of the towns, who, especially in the need of their overlords and rulers for money for the crusades, bargained for charters to govern their own affairs, or, indeed, as they grew stronger, often wrested such rights by force.

The towns and cities, once again, as in ancient days, became the truest practitioners of free self-government but within them the struggle renewed as between

A PHILOSOPHIC CONCEPT

Democratic government, thought of as a thing and mechanism of voters' lists, polls, elections, and legislative and administrative procedures, has of profound philosophic concept and base — nothing less than the capacity for absolute goodness of the mind and spirit of the human being. Because that has been forgotten too long by too many and in too many places, the great structures of Democracy are everywhere shaken and weakening, quite as much from the deterioration and disintegration in moral principles, strength of character and courage of those leaders and led alike — who give it value in service as from the in-vidious inroads and dynamic drive of Communism, whose disciples offer, in the misty twilight of our complacency softened conviction and calculating compromise, clear-cut opposing principles, the practical appeal of definite destinations and a terrible ruthlessness and singleness of purpose in realizing them.

The defence of Democracy is to be encompassed by overthrowing these enemies within no less than by repelling those who threaten to breach its enclosing walls.

The task will be long, painful and tiring, and exact a discipline widely and long discounted, if not despised. But there is little hope
