BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

BIG MOUTH AND SMALL THROAT

The big and little you will find Are most effective when combined. —Old Mother Nature.

Honker the Goose and his flock were resting on the ocean. They were quite a distance out from shore because there was a great bay there and going way inside that bay so as to stay near shore would make the journey to the Sunny South much longer. It was long enough at best. So Honker led his flock in as a straight line as possible going into bays only when necessary in search of food and fresh water flowing into the sea.

While they rested Balaen the Blue Whale, largest of all living animals and of all who ever did live, came from deep down in the water to the surface, or almost to the surface, and began rushing this way and that through the water with his great mouth open. Some of the young Geese, seeing him for the first time and knowing nothing about him, were too frightened even to move. They had been sure that he was going to swallow them and when Honker told them that Big Mouth, as he called the Whale, couldn't swallow one of them even if he wanted to, which he didn't they doubted for the first time their wise old leader. That great mouth was so big that a Goose, no matter how big, would be lost in it. The idea of a Goose or some other small thing as big as a Goose! The very idea!

Honker, who seemed to know much about their big neighbor, explained that what he lived on mostly was what is called plankton, made up of millions of the tiniest things that live in the sea, and it was these that Big Mouth was catching as he could see no reason why he could not swallow a Goose, and said so. "His throat is too small," explained Honker. "Nothing bigger than a small fish can go down it. He has a big mouth but small throat. So you needn't be the least bit afraid that he will even notice you. He won't bother with anything he can't swallow. So don't worry."

But it wasn't until they had a good look inside that great mouth that they were quite sure that their wise old leader was as wise as he seemed to think he was. Big Mouth had disappeared. He had sounded, as the diving of a Whale is called, and they had seen nothing more of him for some time. Then he gave them a great fright by coming to the surface very near them and blowing what looked like a jet of water from the top of his nose into the air. Had they looked as closely as one should always look at something new they would have found that it was warm damp air, not water, that he was blowing from his lungs. All the time he had been sounding he had held his breath just as boys and girls hold their breaths when under water.

Presently he opened his great mouth

Presently he opened that great mouth. Perhaps he was just yawning. Perhaps he was just stretching his lower jaw. Anyway for just a minute or two the young Geese looked straight into the big mouth. From the roof of it were hanging long fringed strips set close together and seeming to fill all the space that his big tongue didn't take. That tongue was huge. "I guess nothing big could get past all that to be swallowed," said one young Goose as she stared and blinked. "I don't see what it is all for. I should think it would be awfully in the way. Imagining having all that hanging in one's mouth. I'm glad I'm not a Whale." "All that" was a mass of thin bony plates, one edge of each deeply fringed. It wasn't at all surprising that the young Geese were puzzled. They had no way of knowing what it was all for; that Big Mouth the Whale without those long, thin, bony, fringed plates and big tongue, that seemed to fill his mouth, couldn't have lived long.

He began to swim. He opened his mouth by dropping his lower jaw. He moved fast through the water so filled with the tiniest of tiny creatures that it was impossible to look down through it. He closed his mouth and water squirted out on both sides. Could the young Geese have peeped inside they might have had that big tongue forcing the water out through those fringes along those plates, the fringes straining out and holding the plankton, as those tiny creatures are called. With the water all out these were swallowed and only a small throat was needed. A big mouth was needed to get enough food at a time, but only a small throat for the size of its possessor, to swallow it.

THE WASTED HONOR

The bidding:
South West North East
1♥ Double Pass 2♦
3♣ Pass 4♥ Pass
Pass Double Pass Pass

North's "preference" for four hearts over three spades is worthy of note. With a holding as bad as North's most players would pass at every opportunity, glad that the opponents had not yet dropped the ace, but North was made of sterner stuff. His partner had not merely "reversed the bidding" but had made a jump reverse bid, and since South certainly would not have done this on a four-card spade suit, his distribution was marked as six hearts and five spades, at the very least. North could assume that South would be ruffed down in trumps from the start, and he could stand these forces a great deal better in his longer heart suit.

West laid down the diamond king, when he saw dummy's two doubletons in the majors, he promptly shifted to the trump six in a natural effort to protect his spade strength. East, however, did not give much cooperation to his partner! When the low trump was played from dummy, East did not even hesitate—he put up his queen. (Or perhaps he did think, but concluded that the heart queen was worthless to him, whereas it might promote a card in partner's hand.) Whatever the fact was, however, it was not a good play! South captured the heart queen, cashed his high spades and then ruffed a spade with the heart ten, while East watched helplessly. Later, South had to give up a spade and a club, but the doubled contract was home.

Perhaps it is now a little redundant to say that East should have played low on the trump lead, to keep his queen over dummy's heart ten!
