make me talk of my grief and my wrongs! they are more than I can bear.

Fullalove forbore directly, and offered him a cigar. He took it, and it soothed him a little; it was long since he had smoked one. His agitation subsided, and a quiet tear or two rolled down his haggard cheek.

The Yankee saw, and kept silence.

But when the cigar was nearly smoked out, he said he was afraid Robert would not find a customer for his island, and what a pity Joshua Fullalove was cool on islands just now.

"Oh," said Robert, "I know there are enterprising Americans on the coast who will give me money for what I have to sell."

Fullalove was silent a minute, then he got a piece of wood and a knife, and said, with an air of resignation, "I reckon we'll have to deal."

The Flying Yankee.

The St. John Sun learns that it is the intention of the Provincial and New England All Rail Link to put the Flying Yankee on the route between St. John and Boston about the first of June, at which date summer travel to the Provinces usually sets in. This service was performed last year to the satisfaction of all patrons, though the rapid time made, some fifteen hours between St. John and Boston, had the effect at first of deterring a certain percentage of timid travellers from patronizing this fast express. No doubt in the old days of iron rails, cumbersome locomotives and hard running cars, the speed attained by the Flying Yankee would have been impossible, but it should not be forgotten that wondrous strides have been made in railway equipment within a recent period, especially in the Maritime Provinces and New England States. The line from St. John to Boston is no exception; iron rails have given to a steel track, improved cars have been introduced and fast locomotives have taken the place of their less speedy predecessors, so that it is possible for a passenger to ride as safely and with as much ease and comfort between the Yankee Hub and the Liverpool of America, as between such populous centres as New York and Philadelphia. So far as the provisions for comfort are considered they could hardly be better, the All-Rail Line being supplied with the celebrated Horton reclining chairs, which have not even yet been introduced on any other road that traverse any portion of the New England States. As for the fast time made between St. John and Boston, it is not really so much due to a high rate of speed as to the reduction of the number of stops made on the journey, only a few of the more important stations between St. John and Bangor being recognized by this train.

A Russian Adventurer.

The death of Countess Henckel of Donnesmark, recalls the memory of the adventurous career of one of the most remarkable of modern adventuresses. Countess Henckel began life as a poor Russian girl, and was at first married to a tailor. Life with the silent ever-busy husband became dull before long, and one day the tailor found that his wife, and with her his scant savings, had departed. She had fled to Paris, where she soon appeared in the highest circles as the reputed wife of a rising artist. When it was found out how things really stood she left the gay capital, and after a while turned up in London, where her beauty and intelligence were held to atone for a multitude of sins. After amassing considerable riches in London she turned her back on England, and appeared again at Paris, the gayest among the gay, where she married a rich Portuguese Marquis. She gathered around her many fashionable, literary and scientific celebrities, and kept her small court in an elegant residence of the Champ Elysees until the death of the Marquis. She afterwards married the Count Henckel of Donnesmark, and died at the age of seventy-two at the castle which, in imitation of the Tuileries, had been built for her in Silesia.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Clergymen to-day are permitted to use more latitude in the choice of their texts than was formerly usual. It is a little startling, nevertheless, to hear of a discourse of a reverend gentleman on the subject of Cinderella. The occasion was a theatrical performance—the pantomime of Cinderella, in fact, was given in Drury Lane some time ago for the recreation of some 3,000 children belonging to the various charitable homes of London. Towards the close of it Canon Shuttleworth came upon the stage to address the assembled young people and he thought the subject of the play might also be made the basis of some appropriate precepts to his little hearers. He urged them to follow Cinderella's example by putting their whole heart and soul into whatever they might have to do, even if it were only cleaning a plate or sweeping a floor. They had just been seeing fairies on the stage. They, too, might become fairies if they pleased, by bringing light and beauty and brightness into other people's lives, by their good temper, kindness and gratitude. There have been worse sermons preached on more conventional texts.

The grand jury has indicted William Riley, sixteen years of age, for murder in the first degree for shooting his father at their home near Adrian, Minn. His sister, Mary Riley, thirteen years old, has been indicted and arraigned for being accessory after the fact. The boy will plead guilty, through his attorney, who will make a statement of the causes leading to the crime.
