CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

Part Two

Victoria was conscious of the need for proceeding carefully. She was aware for the first time of something unstable and fearful in Hazel, and saw her not as what she had always seemed to be, a little, matter-of-fact, elderly woman. She saw her as a person who had at one time possessed a life of her own, a person fated by some inadequacy to clean other people's homes, cook their food, wash their dirty dishes, pretend to like them.

"The poison in that green can didn't run out last Saturday," Victoria stated rather than asked. "The furtive look drained from Hazel's eyes. She shook her head in lengthy negative, as a child does. "No."

"When did you put that poison out on the porch?" "The day before Mr. Hime died. Wednesday morning."

"What really happened to the poison?" "I threw it out. I emptied it into the sink and washed it down the drain with hot water. I took the label off the can, too."

"When?" "Friday morning. While you were asleep on the sofa."

"Why?" Hazel's eyes widened a little as though she thought this already known. "Why, because the police were coming! Because Mr. Hime had died from poison!"

Victoria stared at her. "Don't you see?" Hazel asked. "I don't."

"Why, it was to make things all right for you, dear. The police would have jumped to conclusions, maybe taken you to jail."

"Where did you get such an idea?" "Mrs. Saxe told me."

"Bernice told you that?" "Well, not in those exact words. You see, she got here a little after I did. We were both very excited and upset. After she covered you with a blanket she came in and we talked about Mr. Hime dying from poison. Dr. Mihler told us on the phone. She looked over and saw the label on the can and said, 'Oh dear, I wish that stuff weren't here!' I asked her why, and she said Dr. Mahler phoned the police, from all she'd heard. She said they seemed to jump to conclusions. I said, 'You mean this poison being here might make them think there had been something funny going on?' She said they might get ideas. She said you were her best friend and she knew you wouldn't hurt a fly, but the police didn't know that. I said, 'We could throw it out, and get quite excited and said, 'Let's do that. It can't do any harm.' So I did. While I was scraping the label from the can those first two policemen rang the bell, and Mrs. Saxe waited at the door until I nodded to her to open it. Then, when they'd gone to the bedroom to look at Mr. Hime, we whiskered together a minute and she said not to say anything about it to you, that you were a bad liar."

"I'm a good liar," Hazel added cheerfully. She seemed much happier to have got her secret off her chest.

"Yes," said Victoria. "You are." Bernice, she was thinking. "Is Bernice quite so stupid as that?"

Victoria was pulled to her friend by the strong pull of curiosity. She had to know something. She had to try to judge whether Bernice's desire to eliminate the poison from the kitchen had been simply a manifestation of hysteria, or whether there had been a more concrete reason. Whether Bernice, for a short while at any rate, had been able to believe that she could have killed her husband.

She telephoned Bernice and had used up her gasoline and with Walter's car gone she was stranded. That's why she hadn't been past, although she phoned innumerable times on Saturday. Victoria told her the receiver had been off the hook for quite a while.

"Darling!" Bernice expostulated. "They arrest you for that! Or at least take away your phone."

"It was Leonard Hermes. He happened to be the first person to telephone, and after talking to him I decided I didn't want to talk

AGREE THREE SMILING GENERATIONS

Good cooks are proud of their favourite recipes. And when they find utensils that cook food well, preserve flavour and quality, and clean easily, they're proud of them, too. That's why so many homemakers write in to tell us about their aluminum utensils. Aluminum has been a Canadian kitchen favourite for half a century. So many mothers do more than teach their daughters to cook; they teach them to use good utensils, too!

ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA, LTD.

531 Beaconsfield Avenue, West Saint John, N.S., August 2nd, 1951

Aluminum Company of Canada Limited, Montreal, P.Q.

Dear Sirs:

For the past twenty years I have used aluminum cooking utensils in my home. These utensils are still as good as new even though I have cooked in them every day for a family of six.

My family consisting of four boys and three girls are all enjoying excellent health and have done so throughout their lifetime. I consider these a living example of the health retaining benefits derived from cooking food in aluminum utensils.

My experience has proven that aluminum cooking utensils are so easy to clean and are so economical that I would not trade them for any other cooking utensils on the market today. Furthermore I have always recommended them to my friends and to my children and it pleases me greatly to be able to state here that my three girls who are married and have their own homes are all using aluminum cooking utensils and are all as well satisfied as I am.

Yours very truly,
Mrs. Hagen Carley
