CHAPTER XI
Continued

"Well, now's your chance to reform," the captain told him solemnly. "I never had no use for teetotalers meself, an' what's more I reckon it's dangerous to be one out here. I've held up many a dose of fever with a stiff tot o' whisky, an' though I don't hold with drinking at sea, it's a different matter when the hook's down an' you've got nothin' on your mind. Well, I'm goin' down to take a caulk for an hour or two. Whichever way it goes I look like spending a good part o' the night awake."

he could watch their approach to the distant land. The bare peak of Ofani now showed clearly to the naked eye, and in the course of the next two hours it drew slowly abeam. The new course brought them within five miles of it, and with the aid of the glasses he examined it with interest. As the captain had said, it was about two miles long, and in general shape it bore a faint resemblance to the Rock of Gibraltar. "Well, you are arriving at last, Mr. Thurlow," the doctor observed with a smile. "A long and dangerous route, but you arrive safely at the end. You will be glad to take over your kingdom?" "Glad in a way," Thurlow agreed. "But half-scared of having to take on a job I know nothing about. I don't feel much like the boss of the place now — and I don't look it either! I only hope this trader will be able to supply me with clothes and all the odds and ends I shall be wanting. I won't be able to buy anything, for I haven't any money."

"You can requisition it, as the representative of the Government!" the doctor told him with a laugh. "But have no fear, my friend. You will find things easy enough. I have no doubt, and in time you will know more about your work and yourself as your memory returns. I am confident that it is only a matter of waiting."

"I hope you're right, doctor," Thurlow returned. "And while we are on the subject, I'd like to thank you for all you've done for me this past week. I feel you've helped me enormously already . . ."

"That is nonsense!" the other interrupted. "I have done nothing that could not have been done by anyone. You have to thank your own magnificent constitution for your speedy recovery to health; and for the rest, I have been able to do very little. In point of fact I ought to be grateful to you, for yours has been a very interesting case. I have come upon one or two instances of lost memory before, but in some aspects yours is quite the most interesting. In fact, it is not so much a case of temporarily mislaid memory. I am thinking of writing a monograph upon it, for publication in the records of the Montpellier School of Medicine."

"Well, that's one way of attaining fame!" Thurlow commented. "I was wondering if you would forward particulars to the New Zealand Government. Of course, the captain will report all the facts of the case at Suva, and the fact that you will notify Auckland; but if you sent in a supplementary report from the medical angle, it might excuse me in advance if I fail to do all the things I'm supposed to do. You see, it's quite possible I may have had special instructions of some sort, which I know nothing about . . ."

"But you will!" the doctor insisted. "It will all come in time. However, I will send in a report as you suggest. I must, in fact, for I told the captain I would take the responsibility for landing you here."

They went on to talk of other subjects after that, but Thurlow was satisfied that he had now done all that he could to safeguard himself, and he was feeling comparatively easy in his mind. Whatever the future might hold for him on this island, he could not tell; but at least he had arranged things as well for himself as lay within his power. "Well, here we are!" the captain exclaimed with a satisfied air. "An' here's friend Strang coming down to see what the devil we want!"
