ELLEN'S DIARY

July Is Remembered By One Last, Lovely Souvenir

"What do you think of the day, Ellen?" James questioned this morning, coming in from his first chores to breakfast—strawberries in amber, gold, and orange made bright spots of color on the lawn and welcomed a hummingbird on an early call there. On the slope at the far side of the stream, above which a wisp of night-fog still lingered, like, we fancied, the end of a nice dream. Mr. C's black mane on pasture, lifted her head to note a passing car. In our near window, the small flock of ewes and lambs, which would take them to the stream. It was a pleasant morning.

"Why, it's nice," I said. "It's warmer. And the sun will shine, don't you reckon?"

"That's the question, Ellen," he smiled a bit anxiously. "Will it? I hope so, for we would like to get something done to that hay now lying in swath."

In windows it is now, beneath skies that are starry. Tomorrow may see it brought!

"This evening brought us company, but had come up by car from a sunny waterland, through the deep south to find the coolest of our island places 'refreshing' after the summer-heat. And the trek pleased."

"Our having to go to continue to late—well, I just don't see at the moment how we can get away to the Fair!" M.G.C. offered today after a spell of silence. "Other years, we were able to go, you may say, with easy mind in our north; returns there. Or else so little remained to be done, it didn't seem to matter. But this time there's got to be more out than what's been saved—so that's how it's the mood."

"Oh, it's likely we'll be going in one evening perhaps, no matter."
