The secretary read the minutes of the last meeting, and these were approved and adopted. A quilt which the members had been working on was reported finished and was shown and admired by everyone. Plans in connection with the district convention which will be held in Whim Road Hall was the main topic of discussion for the evening. The secretary reported several articles purchased for the hall in this connection. Correspondence received during the month was read and those who did not already receive an Institute Handbook were given one.

The Neighbors By George Clark

'Can't you let your father celebrate his day of freedom?'

Strategic Spain

By DOROTHY GOOD American Geographical Society

The role for which Spain is cast in a possible European war is usually that of a bridgehead or last bastion when the continent has been overrun. Behind the Pyrenees, the reasoning goes, air attacks might be launched from the high tableland of the Iberian Peninsula, the westernmost part of Europe. Spain's 200-mile coast, half on the Atlantic, half on the Mediterranean, and her position as a sort of landing stage from North Africa make access to Spain from other continents comparatively simple for a power controlling the sea.

Spain's position is strengthened by her protectorate over Spanish North Africa directly across the Strait of Gibraltar, by possession of the Balearic Islands in the Mediterranean, and the West African territory of Rio de Oro, opposite the Canary Islands. Close relations with Portugal, her neighbor in the peninsula, and possession of the important Azores air bases, give added strength.

The strategy assumes that the Pyrenees could be held against a France in enemy hands. But the Pyrenees barrier is not unassailable, as many invasions have testified. About 500 B.C. Celts from southwest Germany have crossed it, and most recently Napoleon's invasion led to the Peninsular War of 1807-1813.

The main range, 5000 to nearly 11,200 feet high, drops abruptly on the French side but tapers at both ends. The Mediterranean coastal plain, about two miles wide, is followed by a railroad, and 12 miles inland a highway crosses a pass at 900 feet. The Atlantic coastal plain is five miles wide, and for 25 miles inland the mountains are lower than 2400 feet. Railroads cross two lines in the main range. For protection, the Spaniards build their lines of broad gauge, so that all traffic must transfer at the border.

Spanish defenses might be vulnerable to submarine. For any prolonged defense, supplies must come by sea, and only larger indentations on the west and south give reasonably safe access. The industrial ports, Barcelona and Bilbao, lack natural protection. Spanish merchant and fishing fleets could not assist greatly, since most of their activity is coastwise. Few shipyards are equipped to serve large ships.

A rugged country, Spain has a higher mean altitude than any other European state except Switzerland. Most of the peninsula is a vast, sparsely populated plateau, called the Meseta, generally 2000 feet above sea level, hemmed in and divided up by mountains. At the center of the windswept tableland, with its scanty vegetation and extreme summer heat and winter cold, is Madrid (pop. 1,500,000), the capital and the key to its control.

As the Meseta is cursed with aridity, most of Spain's 28 million live in the narrow coastal plains that fringe almost the whole peninsula. Everywhere highway and railroad systems are thin, and navigable waterways virtually lacking. Therefore the coastal regions - Catalonia, Valencia, Andalusia, the Basque provinces, Asturias, Galicia - are in times of stress difficult to control from Madrid. They are largely isolated from one another, and a high degree of regional individuality and self-determination has developed through the centuries.

These coastal regions are the only parts that could feed and provision an army. The task would be difficult, however. Although Spain is predominantly agricultural, scarcity of water makes harvest precarious.

War materials would be in short supply from local sources, for Spanish metallurgical and chemical industries are still far from self-sufficient. Spain's surplus of many minerals - mercury, potassium salts, lead, zinc, fluor spar, celestine, sulphur, pyrites, titanium, calcined siderite, and iron ore from Spanish Morocco - are mostly exported in a crude state because of inadequate power resources.

Though Spain is poor, the courage of her people makes them superb guerrilla fighters. For this form of warfare the mountain-clad slopes (bushes and evergreens, sometimes dense, some low, some more than head-high) and the canyons of the Meseta are admirably suited. Spanish fighters, if they believed they were defending the right, would be an invaluable help against invading forces.
