ALIKE YET NOT ALIKE When meeting strangers be polite. Advice that's sound though it be trite. —Old Mother Nature.

Young Too-Smart, the smart young son of Reddy Fox, was now truly out in the Great World. For some time he had been living by himself and had thought he was out in the Great World, but he wasn't. All the time he had been living in the neighborhood where he had been born and where his father and mother and some of his brothers and sisters still lived. He saw one or more of them every day. All the time he had been going to school, learning through experience and by watching his father and mother. They had taught him much in the precious art of happy living. He had expected to go right on living in that neighborhood. Now to his shocked surprise he had found out that he couldn't do that; that he wouldn't be allowed to do it; that if he didn't go of his own accord he would be driven away, and that by his own father and mother. It was Reddy Fox himself who had told him so. They had been hunting together and were returning to the Old Pasture in which was the home where the young fox had been born. At the edge of it Reddy stopped. "This is as far as you come. We part company right here," said Reddy. The young fox stared at Reddy without understanding. "I don't know what you mean," said he. "I mean that you are now ready to go out in the Great World and make a home for yourself. I've taught you how to hunt for your food, what enemies to watch out for, and how to fool them. Now it is time for you to be dependent on no one but yourself; to go out in the Great World and find a place to make a home for yourself in a neighborhood where there are few if any other foxes," said Reddy. "But I like it around here. I want to stay here," protested the young fox. "This is our neighborhood, your mother's and mine and our children's until they are big enough and old enough to look out for themselves as you are. After that there is food enough for only two of us and much of the time it is hard hunting. So now it is time for you to find a place somewhere else, hunting grounds of your own. So on your way! Good luck and good hunting." So it was that the young fox suddenly found himself a wanderer.

At first with everything unfamiliar the Great World seemed rather dreadful. He was lonesome and frightened by the strangeness of things. But day by day he got over this and his feeling of independence grew. It was a nice feeling. It always is. Early one morning on the edge of a small swamp he came face to face with a stranger, one about his own size, very like himself in some ways and unlike in others. For one thing the stranger was dressed in gray while his own coat was by now a lovely red. He saw that the stranger was a member of the fox family. There was no doubt. "Who are you?" asked the young fox, bluntly, and not altogether politely. "I'm Gray Fox. I suppose I must be a cousin of yours. What are you doing here?" replied the other. "Seeing the Great World," replied the young fox. He sounded rather self-important.

Contract Bridge by Josephine Culbertson. NO LAYDOWN. Making even the low contract of two spades on the following hand proved to be something of a problem — as quite a few declarers in a duplicate game found out. North dealer. East-West vulnerable. ♠ K 8 5, ♠ K 8 4 3, ♠ J 6 3, ♠ Q 7, ♠ A Q J 10 7 2, ♠ A 8 5, ♠ J 4. This was the auction at many tables: North Pass, East Pass, South Pass, West Pass. As it happened, East-West could have done well at a club contract, but neither player could well risk a bid. At most of the tables West cashed the top clubs and shifted to hearts, and in every case but one this resulted in the defeat of the
