Minds Are Busy Planning Precious Summer Hours

The days of the Maytime come and go, turning into the weeks that pass all too soon. Hands are busy, minds too, planning the hours so precious to all. For no matter the age, young or older, we have only a lifetime to live. So we do not always come to us. So we tend faithfully to the cares of our world. This item of words we shall do today that, if the fates agree, we shall live some tomorrow.

And sometimes in our living, when the weight of our cares distresses, we fust and worry—secretly perhaps, or it may be apparent in the anxious expressions we wear. Then is the time to come away a while from it all. To draw a long breath and "lift over to the hills" of the countryside and the wider vistas and lovely, about. Or bound to the sea, find inspiration, upward look the inspiration of a May loveliness, the minutes of the day against the sky. For beauty is everywhere about in this Maytime, particularly as we are reminded, it is found in the eye of the beholder.

"What a charming view you give from here!" we remarked one afternoon to a man new to an office in the city. When we returned to the scene through the party—especially "what a view" we are reminded, it is found in the eye of the beholder.

"Why, I had noticed," he said. "My loss!" he smiled. Perhaps when he stays my mind and the new committee reported that a new plan had been purchased and installed in the Institute kitchen. The meeting reported that a new plan had been purchased and installed in the Institute kitchen. The meeting reported that a new plan had been purchased and installed in the Institute kitchen.
